RAMMAR, which is the art of using words properly, comprises four parts; Orthography, Etymology, Syntax, and Prosody.

In this division and order of the parts of grammar I follow the common grammarians, without enquiring whether a fitter distribution might not be found. Experience has long shown this method to be so distinct as to obviate consustion, and so comprehensive as to prevent any inconvenient omissions. I likewise use the terms already received, and already understood, though perhaps others more proper might sometimes be invented. Sylburgius, and other innovators, whose new terms have sunk their learning into neglect, have left sufficient warning against the trifling ambition of teaching arts in a new language.

ORTHOGRAPHY is the art of combining letters into fyllables, and fyllables into words. It therefore teaches previously the form and found of letters.

different forms, our alphabet may be properly faid to confid of twenty-fix letters

None of the small consonants have a double form, except f, s; of which f is used in the beginning and middle, and s at the end.

Vowels are five, a, e, i, o, u.

Such is the number generally received; but for i it is the practice to write y in the end of words, as thy, holy; before i, as from die, dying; from beautify, beautifying; in the words fays, days, eyes; and in words derived from the Greek, and written originally with v, as system, σύςπμα, Sympathy, συμπάθεια.

For u we often write w after a vowel, to make a diphthong; as raw, grew, view, vow, flowing, 1

The founds of all the letters are various.

In treating on the letters, I shall not, like for rians, enquire into the original of their form as into their formation and prolation by the organ chanick, anatomist, or physiologist; nor into dation of founds, or the elegance or harsh tions, as a writer of universal and transsider the English alphabet only as it is row view I follow the example of formore reverence than judgment, he pose my reader already acquait because of sounds in general is to describe them. as father, rather, congratulate, jumy, guijs.

A broad resembles the a of the German; as all, wall, call.

Many words pronounced with a broad were anciently written with au, as fault, mault; and we fill fay fault, vault. This was probably the Saxon found, for it is yet retained in the northern laters, and in the ruftick pronunciation; as maur for man, kaund for

The short a approaches to the a open, as grass.

The long a, if prolonged by e at the end of the word, is always stender, as graze, fame.

A forms a diphthong only with : or y, and u or w. Ai or ay, as in plain, wain, gay, clay has only the found of the long and flender a, and diffes not in the pronunciation from plane, wane.

Au or aw has the found of the German a, as raso. naughty.

As is fometimes found in Latin wordoot completely natural fed or assimilated, but is no English diplining; and is more properly expressed by single i, as Cofar, Eneas.

RA MMA G R F

E.

E is the letter which occurs most frequently in the English language.

E is long, as in scene; or short, as in cellar, separate, celebrate, men, then.

It is always short before a double consonant, or swo consonants, relent, medlar, reptile, ferpent, cellar, cessation, bleffing, fell, felling, debt.

E is always mute at the end of a word, except in monofyllables that have no other vowel, as the; or proper names, as Penelope, Phebe, Derbe; being used to modify the foregoing consonant, as fince, once, bedge, oblige; or to lengthen the preceding vowel, as ban, bane; can, cane; pin, pine; tun, tune; rob, robe; pop, pope; fir, fire; cur, cure; tub, tube.

Almost all words which now terminate in consonants ended anciently in e, as year, yeare, wildness, wildness; which e probably had the force of the French e seminine, and constituted a syllable with its associate consonant; for, in old editions, words are sometimes divided thus, cleare, fel-le, knowledge. This e was perhaps for a time vocal or silent in poetry as convenience required; but it has been long wholly mute. Camden calls it the silent e.

It does not always lengthen the foregoing vowel, as glove, live, give.

It has fometimes in the end of words a found obscure, and scarcely perceptible, as open, shapen, shotten, thistle, participle, metre, lucre.

E forms a diphthong with a, as near; with i, as deign, receive; and with u or w, as new, flew.

Ea founds like e long, as mean; or like ee, as dear, clear, near.

Ei is founded like e long, as feize, perceiving.
Eu founds as u long and fost.
E, a, u are combined in beauty and its derivatives, but have only the found of u.

O is uniced. ... ... desirved from Greek as accomy; but oe being not an English diphthong, they are better written as they are founded, with only e, economy.

With i, as oil, foil, moil, noisome.

This coalition of letters feems to unite the founds of the two letters as far as two founds can be united without being destroyed, and therefore approaches more nearly than any combination in our tongue to the notion of a dphthong.

With o, as bout, boot, cooler; oo has the found of the Italian u.

With u or w, as our, power, flower; but in some words has only the found of o long, as in foul, bowl, fow, grow. These lifferent sounds are used to distinguish different significations; as bow, an instrument for shooting; bow, a depresson of the head: fow, the she of a boar; fow, to scatte seed : bowl, an orbicular body; bowl, a wooden veft.

Ou is fometimes ponounced like o foft, as court; fometimes like o fhort as cough; fometimes like u close, as could; or u open, as rough, tough; which use only can teach.

Ou is frequently used in the last syllable of end in or, and are made English, as bonour, la.
nor, labor, faror.
Some late innovators have ejected the u, with the last syllable gives the sound neither of or nor tween them, if not compounded of both; besides as are published to us from the French nouns in eur, as bineur, sjuveur?

U is long in use, confusion; or short, as us, concus-Sion.

It coalesces with a, e, i, o; but has rather in these combinations the force of the w consonant, as quaff, quest, quite, languish; sometimes in ui the i loses its sound, as in juice. It is sometimes mute before a, e, i, y, as guard, guest, guise, buy.

U is followed by e in wirtue, but the e has no found.

Ue is sometimes mute at the end of a word, in imitation of the French; as prorogue, synagogue, piague, vague, barangue.

Y is a vowel, which, as Quintilian observes of one of the Roman letters, we might want without inconvenience, but that we have it. It supplies the place of i at the end of words, as thy; before an i, as dying; and is commonly retained in derivative words where it was part of a diphthong in the primitive; as destroy, de-stroyer; betray, betrayed, betrayer; pray, prayer; say, Sayer; day, days.

T being the Saxon vowel y, which was commonly used where i is now put, occurs very frequently in all old books.

GENERAL RULES.

A vowel in the beginning or middle fyllable, before two confonants, is commonly short, as opportunity.

In monofyllables a fingle vowel before a fingle confonant is short, as stag, frog.

OF CONSONANTS.

B has one unvaried found, fuch as it obtains in other languages.

It is mute in debt, debtor, fubtle, doubt, lamb, limb, dumb, thumb, climb, comb, womb.

It is used before I and r, as black, brown.

C has before e and i the found of f; as fincerely, centrick, century, circular, ciftern, city, ficcity: before a, o, and u, it founds like k, as calm, concavity, copper, incorporate, curiofity, concupiscence.

C might be omitted in the language without loss, fince one of its founds might be supplied by f, and the other by k, but that it preferves to the eye the etymology of words, as face from facies, captive from captivus.

Ch has a found which is analysed into the, as church, chin, crutch. It is the fame found which the Italians give to the e simple before i and e, as citta, cerro.

Cb is founded like k in words derived from the Greek, as christ, scheme, choler. Arch is commonly sounded ark before a vowel as Langel; and with the English sounded consonant, as archbishop.

Ch, in fome French words ot you milated, founds like fb, as machine, chaife.

C. sacording to English orthography, never ends a word; therefore we write fick, black, which were originally flicke, blocke, in such words.

Is now mute.

It is used before I and *, as clock, crofs.

Is uniform in its found, as death, diligent. It is used before r, as draw, dross; and w, as dwell.

Il though having a name beginning with a vowel, it is numbered by the grammarians among the femivowels, yet has this quality of a mute, that it is commodiously sounded before a liquid, as flask, fly, freckle. It has an unvariable sound, except that of is sometimes. spoken nearly as ov.

G has two founds, one hare, ... in gay, go, gun; the other foft, as in gem, giant.

AL

LISH $\mathbf{T}$ N G O N E.

At theend of a word it is always hard, ring, snug, fong, frq.
Befor e and i the found is uncertain.

G beore e is fost, as gem, generation, except in gear, gold; eese, get, gewgaw, and derivatives from words ending in g, as singing, stronger, and generally before er at the end of words, as singer.

( is mute before n, as gnash, sign, foreign. G before i is hard, as give, except in giant, gigantick, abbet, gibe, giblets, giles, gill, gilliflower, gin, ginger, gingle, gipsy.

Gb in the beginning of a word has the found of the hard g, as ghostly; in the middle, and sometimes at the end, it is quite filent, as though, right, fought, fpoken tho', rite, soute.

It has often at the end the found of f, as laugh; whence laughter retains the same found in the middle; cough, trough, sough, tough, enough.

It is not to be doubted, but that in the original pronunciation gb had the force of a confonant, deeply guttural, which is still continued among the Scotch,

G is used before b, I, and r.

H is a note of aspiration, and shows that the following vowel must be pronounced with a strong emission of the breath, as bat, borfe.

It seldom, perhaps never, begins any but the first syllable, in which it is always sounded with a full breath, except in beir, berb, bostler, bonour, bumble, bonest, bumour, and their derivatives.

7 consonant sounds uniformly like the soft g, and is therefore a letter useless, except in etymology, as ejaculation, jester, jocund, juice.

K has the found of hard c, and is used before e and i,. where, according to English analogy, c would be fost, as kept, king, skirt, skeptick, for so it should be written, not sceptick.

It is used before n, as knell, knot, but totally loses its found.

K is never doubled; but c is used before it to shorten the vowel by a double confonant, as cockle, pickle.

L has in English the same liquid sound as in other languages.

The custom is to double the lat the end of monofyllables, as kill, will, full. These words were originally written kille, wille, fulle; and when the e first grew silent, and was afterwards omitted, the ll was retained, to give force, according to the analogy of our language, to the foregoing vowel.

L is sometimes mute, as in calf, balf, balves, calves, could, would, should, pfalm, talk, falmon, falcon.

The Saxon, who delighted in guttural founds, fomerimes aforested the l at the beginning of words, as h'ar, a loaf, or bread; him in a lord; but this pronunciation is now.

Le at the end of words is prohounced like a weak in which the e is almost mute, as table, shuttle.

M has always the fame found, as murmur, ...onumental.

N has always the same found, as noble, manners. N is sometimes muse after m, as damn, condemn,

P has always the same sound, which the Welsh and Germans confound with B.

P is sometimes mute, as in psalm, and between m and t, as tempt.

Ph is used for f in words derived from the Greek, as philosopher, philanthropy, Philip.

Q, as in other languages, is always followed by u, and has a found which our Saxon ancestors well expressed by cp, tw, as quadrant, queen, equestrian, quill, enquiry, quire, quotidian. Qu is never followed by u.

Qu is fometimes founded, in words derived from the French, like k, as conquer, liquor, risque, chequer.

R.

R has the same rough snarling sound as in other tongues.

The Saxons used often to put b before it, as before I at the beginning of words.

Rb is used in words derived from the Greek, as myrrb, myrrbine, caturrhous, rheum, rheumatick, rhyme.

Re, at the end of some words derived from the Latin or French, is pronounced like a weak er, as theatre, Sepulchre.

S has a histing found, as fibilation, fifter.

A fingle s feldom ends any word, except the third person of verbs as loves, grows; and the plurals of nouns, as trees, buffes, diffresses, the pronouns this, his, ours, yours, us; the adverb thus; and words derived from Latin, as rebus, surplus; the close being always either in se, as house, horse, or in si, as grass, dress, bliss, less, anciently grasse, dresses.

S single, at the end of words, has a grosser sound, like that of z, as trees, eyes, except this, thus, us, rebus, furplus. It founds like z before ion, if a vowel goes before, as intrusion; and like f, if it follows a consonant, as conversion. It founds like z before e mute, as refuse, and before y final, as rosy; and in those words, bosom, desire, wisdom, prison, prisoner, present, présent, damsel, casement. It is the peculiar quality of f, that it may be founded before all confonants, except x and z, in which f is comprised, x being only k and z a hard or gross f. This f is therefore termed by grammar fue potestatis litera, the reason of which the learned Dr. Cloroneously supposed to be, that in some words it might be a pleasure. Thus we find in several languages:

Elimous, scatter, sdegno, sdrucciolo, sfavellare, oo, sgranare, shake, slumber, smell, strife, space, splendour shrew, slep, strength, stramen, sventura, swell.

S is mute in ifle, island, demesne,

T has its customary sound, a Tr before a vowel has the except an f goes before, wife derivatives from y, a

Of w, which in diphthongs is often an undoubted vowel, some grammarians have doubted whether it ever be a confonant; and not rather as it is called a double u or ou, as water may be resolved into ouater; but letters of the same sound are always reckoned consonants in other alphabets: and it may be observed, that w follows a vowel without any hiatus or difficulty of utterance, as frosty winter.

Wh has a found accounted peculiar to the English, which the Saxons better expressed by hp, bw, as what, whence, whiting; in whore only, and sometimes in wholesome, wh is sounded like a simple b.

X begins no English word; it has the sound of ks, as axle, extraneous.

Y, when it follows a confonant, is a vowel; when it precedes either vowel or diphthong, is a confonant, ye,

R M $\mathbf{M}$ R 0 F T H E

It is thought by some to be in all cases a vowel. But it may be observed of y as of w, that it follows a vowel without any hiatus, as rosy youth.

Z begins no word originally English; it has the found, as its name izzard or f bard expresses, of an f uttered with closer compression of the palate by the tongue, as freeze, froze.

In orthography I have supposed orthospy, or just utterance of awards, to be included; orthography being only the art of expressing certain founds by proper characters. I have therefore observed in what words any of the letters are mute.

Most of the writers of English grammar have given long tables of words pronounced otherwise than they are written, and seem not sufficiently to have considered, that of English, as of all living tongues, there is a double pronunciation, one cursory and colloquial, the other regular and solemn. The cursory pronunciation is always vague and uncertain, being made different in different mouths by negligence, unskilfulness, or affectation. The solemn pronunciation, though by no means immutable and permanent, is yet always less remote from the orthography, and less liable to capricious innovation. They have however generally formed their tables according to the cursory speech of those with whom they happened to converse; and concluding that the whole ration combines to vitiate language in one manner, have often established the jargon of the lowest of the people as the model of speech.

For pronunciation the best general rule is, to consider those as the most elegant speakers who deviate least from the written words.

There have been many schemes offered for the emendation and settlement of our orthography, which, like that of other nations, being formed by chance, or according to the fancy of the earliest writers in rude ages, was at first very various and uncertain, and is yet sufficiently irregular. Of these reformers some have endeavoured to accommodate orthography better to the pronunciation, without considering that this is to measure by a shadow, to take that for a nodel or standard which is changing while they apply it. Others, and indeed, but with equal unlikelihood of success, have red to proportion the number of letters to that of sounds, and may have its own character, and every character such would be the orthography of a new language synod of grammarians upon principles of science.

Dr. Gill was followed by Charles Butler, a man who did nowant an understanding which might have qualified him for better empoyment. He seems to have been more tanguine than his predecestes, for he printed his book according to his own scheme; which the following specimen will make easily understood.

But whenfoever you have occasion to trouble their patience, or to come among them being troubled, it is better to stand upon your guard, than to trust to their gentleness. For the safeguard of your face, which they have most mind unto, provide a pursehood, made of coarse boultering, to be drawn and knit about your collar, which for more safety is to be lined against the eminent parts with woollen cloth. First cut a piece about an inch and an half broad, and half a yard long, to reach round by the temples and forehead, from one ear to the other; which being sowed in his place, join unto it two short pieces of the same breadth under the eyes, for the balls of the cheeks, and then set an other piece about the breadth of a shilling against the top of the nose. At other times, when they are not angered, a little piece half a quarter broad, to cover the eyes and parts about them, may serve though it be in the heat of the day. about them, may ferve though it be in the heat of the day.

At oder tim's, pen dey ar' not angered, a little piec' half a quarter broad, to cover de eys and parts about them, may serve down it be in the heat of de day. Butter on the Nature and Properties of Bees, 1634.

In the time of Charles I. there was a very prevalent inclination to change the orthography; as appears, among other books, in such editions of the works of Milton as were published by himself. Of these reformers every man had his own scheme; but they agreed in one general design of accommodating the letters to the pronunciation, by ejecting such as they thought superfluous. Some of them would have written these lines thus:

All the erth Shall then be paradis, far happier place Than this of Eden, and far happier dais.

Bishop Wilkins afterwards, in his great work of the philosophical language, proposed, without expecting to be followed, a regular orthography; by which the Lord's prayer is to be written thus:

Yar Fadher haitsh art in heven, halloed bi dhyi nam, dhyi cingdym cym, dhy aill bi dyn in erth as at is in heven, &c.

We have fince had no general reformers; but some ingenious men have endeavoured to deserve well of their country, by writing honor and labor for honour and labour, red for read in the preter-tense, sais for says, repete for repeat, explane for explain, or declame for declaim. Of these it may be faid, that as they have done no good, they have done little harm; both because they have innovated little, and because sew have followed them.

ETYMOLOGY.

ETYMOLOGY teaches the deduction of one word from another, and the various modifications by what the fense of the same word is diversified; as borse, borses; I love, I loved.

Of the ARTICLE.

The English have two articles, an or a, and the.

AN, A.

A has an indefinite fignification, and means one, with fome reference to more; as, This is a good book, that is, one among the books that are good. He was killed by a fword, that is, fome fword. This is a better book for a man than a boy, that is, for one of those that are men than one of those that are boys. An army might enter without resistance, that is, any comy.

In the senses in which we use a or an in the singular, we speak in the plural without an article; as, these are good books.

I have made an the original article, because it is only the Saxon an, or an, one, applied to a new use, as the German ein, and the French 4

T H G L 1

French un; the n being cut off before a consonant in the speed of ut-Grammarians of the last age direct, that an should be used before b; whence it appears that the English anciently aspirated less. An is still used before the filent b, as an berb, an bonest man: but otherwise a; as,

A horse, a horse, my kingdom for a horse. Shake [peare.

THE has a particular and definite fignification.

The fruit

Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death into the world. Milton.

That is, that particular fruit, and this world in which we live. So He giveth fodder for the cattle, and green berbs for the use of man; that is, for those beings that are cattle, and his use that is man.

The is used in both numbers.

I am as free as Nature first made man, Ere the base laws of servitude began, When wild in woods the noble favage ran.

Many words are used without articles; as,

1. Proper names, as John, Alexander, Longinus, Ari-fearchus, Jerusalem, Athens, Rome, London. God is used as a proper name.

2. Abstract names, as blakness, witchcraft, virtue, vice, beauty, ugliness, love, batred, anger, goodnature,

3. Words in which nothing but the mere being of any thing is implied: This is not beer, but water; This is not brass, but steel.

Of Nouns Substantives.

The relations of English nouns to words going before or following are not expressed by cases, or changes of termination, but as in most of the other European languages by prepositions, unless we may be said to have a genitive case.

Magistris, from Masters, from the Masters. Abl.

> Our nouns are therefore only declined thus: Gen. Masters. .. Masters. Master, Scholar, Gen. Scholars. Plur. Scholars.

These genitives are always written with a mark of elision, master's, scholar's, according to an opinion long received, that the 's is a contraction of bis, as the foldier's valour, for the soldier his valour: but this cannot be the true original, because 's is put to semale nouns, Woman's beauty; the Virgin's delicary; Haughty Juno's unrelenting hate: and collective nouns, as Women's passions; the rabble's insolence; the multitude's folly; in all these cases it is apparent that bis cannot be understood. We say likewise, the foundation's strength, the diamond's suspense for the winter's severity; but in these cases his may be understood, he and bis having formerly been applied to neuters in the place now supplied by it and its.

The learned, the sagacious Wallis, to whom every English grammarian owes a tribute of reverence, calls this modification of the noun an arjestive possessing it then summer than a summarian of the senitive in equitum decus, Trojæ oris, or any other Latin genitive.

This termination of the noun seems to constitute a real genitive indicating possession. It is derived to us from those who declined passion, a smith; Gen. passor, of a smith; Plur. passor, or passor, smith; and in two other of their seven-declensions.

It is a further construction of this opinion, that in the old poets both the genitive and plural were longer by a syllable than the original word; knitis, for knight's, in Chaucer; leavis, for leaves, in Spenser. When a word ends it is, the genitive may be the same with the nominative, as Venus Tapisle.

No LXXXIII.

The plural is formed by adding s, as table, tables ; fly, flies; fifter, fifters; wood, woods; or es where s could not otherwise be sounded, as after ch, s, fb, x, z; after chounded like s, and g like j; the mute e is vocal bese s, as lance, lances; outrage, outrages.

The formation of the plural and genitive fingular is the fame.

A few words yet make the plural in n, as men, women, oxen, faline, and more anciently eyen and ficon. This formation is that which generally prevails in the Teutonick dialects.

Words that end in f commonly form their plural by wes, as loaf, loaves; calf, calves.

Except a few, muff, muffs; chief, chiefs. So boof, roof, proof, re-kef, mischief, puff, cuff, dwarf, handkerchief, grief. Irregular plurals are teeth from tooth, lice from loufe, mice from ouse, geefe from goose, feet from soot, dice from die, sen e from penny, ethren from brother, children from child.

Plurals ending in s have no genitives; but we fay, Vomens excellencies, and Weigh the mens wits against the ladies bairs. Pope.

Dr. Wallis thinks the Lords' boule may be said for the boule of Lords; but such phrases are not now in use; and surely an English ear reals against them.

Of ADJECTIVES.

Adjectives in the English language are wholly indeclinable; having neither case, gender, nor number, and being added to substantives in all relations without any change; as, a good woman, good women, of a good woman; a good man, good men, of good men.

The Comparison of Adjectives.

The comparative degree of adjectives is formed by adding er, the superlative by adding est, to the politive as, fair, fairer, fairest; lovely, lovelier, loveliest; sa fweeter, fweetest; low, lower, lowest; big. highest.

Some words are irregularly compared; best; bad, worse, worst; little, less, lead next; much, more, most; many (or me most (for moest); late, later, latest

Some comparatives form a fur. as netber, netbermost; outer, up, upper, uppermost; fore,

Most is sometimes adder Southmost.

Many adjectives do minations, and are c benevolent, more be-are feldom compared otherwise than by more ar as deplorable, more deplorable, most deplorable.

Diffyllables are seldom compared is they terminate in fome, as fulsome, toilsome; in ful, as careful, spleenful, dreadful; in ing, as trisling, charming; in ous, as porous; in less, as careless, harmless; in ed, as wretched; in id; as candid; in al, as mortal; in ent, as recent, fervent; in ain, as certain; in ive, as missive; in dy, as woody; in fy, as puffy; in ky, as rocky, except lucky; in my, as roomy; in my, as skinny; in py, as ropy, except happy; in ry, as boary.

Some comparatives and superlatives are yet found in good writers formed without regard to the foregoing rules; but in a language subjected so little and so lately to grammar, such anomalies must frequently occur.

So floady is compared by Millon.
She in floadiest covert hid,

The termination in is may be accounted in some fort a degree of comparison, by which the signification is diminished below the positive, as black, blackis, or tending to blackness; salt, saltish, or having a little taste of salt: they therefore admit no comparison. This termination is seldom added but to words expressing sensible qualities, nor often to words of above one syllable, and is scarcely used in the solemn or sublime style. folemn or fublime ftyle.

Pronouns, in the English language, are, I, thou, he, with their plurals we, ye, they, it, who, which, what, whether, who soever, what soever, my, mine, our, ours, thy, thine, your, yours, his, her, hers, their, theirs, this, that, another, the fame.

Our, yours, hers, theirs, are used when the substantive preceding is separated by a verb, as These are our books. These books are ours. Your children excel ours in stature, but ours surpass yours in learning. Ours, yours, hers, theirs, notwithstanding their seeming plural termination, are applied equally to singular and plural substantives, as This book is ours. These books are ours.

Mine and thine were formerly used before a vowel, as mine amiable lady; which though now disused in prose, might be still properly continued in poetry: they are used as ours and yours, when they are referred to a substantive preceding.

Their and theirs are the possessives likewise of it, and are therefore applied to things.

Pronouns relative are, who, which, what, whether, whosoever, what soever.

Whether is only used in the nominative and accusative cases; and has no plural, being applied only to one of a number, commonly to one of two, as, Whether of these is left I known not. Whether shall I choose? It is now almost obsolete.

The plural others is not used but when it is referred to a substantive preceding, as I have fent other horses. I have not fent the same horses, but others.

Another, being only an other, has no plural.

Here, there, and where, joined with certain particles, have a relative and pronominal use. Hereof, berein, bereby, bereafter, berewith, thereof, therein, thereby, thereupon, therewith, whereof, wherein, whereby, whereupon, wherewith, which fignify, of this, in this, &c. of that, in that, &c. of which, in which, &c.

Therefore and wherefore, which are properly there for ad where for, for that, for which, are now reckoned conjunctions, and continued in use. The rest seem to be passing by degrees into neglect, though proper, useful, and analogous. They are referred both to fingular and plural antecedents.

There are two more words used only in conjunction with pronouns, own and felf.

Own is added to possessives, both singular and plural, as my own band, our own bouse. It is emphatical, and implies a filent contrariety or opposition; as, I live in my own bouse, that is, not in a bired bouse. This I did with my own band, that is, without belp, or not by proxy.

Self is added to possessives, as myself, yourselves; and sometimes to personal pronouns, as bimself, itself, themfelves. It then, like own, expresses emphasis and opposition, as I did this myself, that is, not another; or it forms a reciprocal pronoun, as, We burt ourselves by vain

Himself, itself, themselves, is supposed by Wallis to be put by corruption, for his self, it' self, their selves; so that self is always a substantive. This seems justly observed, for we say, He came himself; Himself shall do this; where himself cannot be an accusative.

Of the VERB.

English verbs are active, as I love; or neuter, as I languish. The neuters are formed like the actives.

Most verbs signifying action, may likewise signify condition or habit, and become neuters, as I love, I am in love; I strike, I am now. ftriking,

The rest are as in the indicative.

Infinitive. To do; to have done.

Participle pref. Doing. Participle preter. Done.

R O F T M M A H E

Do is sometimes used superfluously, as, I do love, I did love; simply for I love, or I loved; but this is considered as a vitious mode of speech.

It is fometimes used emphatically; as,

I do love thee, and when I love thee not, Chaos is come again. Shakespeare.

It is frequently joined with a negative; as, I like ber, but I do not love ber; I wished him success, but did not belp bim.

The Imperative prohibitory is seldom applied in the fecond person, at least in prose, without the word do; as, Stop him, but do not burt him; Praise beauty, but do not dote on it.

Its chief use is in interrogative forms of speech, in which it is used through all the persons; as, Do I live? Dost thou strike me? Do they rebel? Did I complain? Didst thou love her? Did she die? So likewise in negative interrogations; Do I not yet grieve? Did she not die?

Do is thus used only in the simple tenses.

There is another manner of conjugating neuters verbs, which, when it is used, may not improperly denominate them neuter passives, as they are inflected according to the passive form by the help of the verb substantive to be. They answer nearly to the reciprocal verbs in French;

I am risen, surrexi, Latin; Je me suis levé, French. I was walked out, exieram; Je m' etois promené.

In like manner we commonly express the present tense; as, I am going, eo. I am gricving, dolco. She is dying, illa moritur. The tempest is raging, furit procel'a. I am pu suing an enemy, hostem insequer. So the other tenses, as, We were avalking, itoyxxxvous westards so, I have been walking, I had been walking, I shall or aviil wipπά είτς. I have been walking, I had been walking, I shall or will be walking.

There is another manner of using the active participle, which gives it a passive signification; as, The grammar is now printing, grammatica jam nunc chartis imprimitur. The brass is forging, æra excuduntur. This is, in my opinion, a vitious expression, probably corrupted from a phrase more pure, but now somewhat obsolete: The book is a printing, The brass is a forging; a being properly at, and printing and forging verbal nouns signifying action, according to the analogy of this language.

The indicative and conjunctive moods are by modern writers from

The indicative and conjunctive moods are by modern writers frequently confounded, or rather the conjunctive is wholly neglected, when some convenience of versification does not invite its revival. It a used among the purer writers after if, though, cre, before, whether, except, unless, whatseever, whomseever; and words of wishing; as, Doubless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and lived acknowledge us not.

Ijrael acknowledge us not.

Of IRREGULAR VERBS.

The English verbs were divided by Ben Johnson into four conjugations, without any reason arising from the nature of the language, which has properly but one conjugation, fuch as has been exemplified; from which all deviations are to be confidered as anomalies, which are indeed in our monofyllable Saxon verbs and the verbs derived from them very frequent; but almost all the verbs which have been adopted from other languages, follow the regular form.

Our verbs are observed by Dr. Wallis to be irregular only in the formation of the preterite, and its participle. Indeed, in the scantiness of our conjugations, there is scarcely any other place for irregularity.

The first irregularity, is a slight deviation from the regular sorm, by rapid utterance or poetical contraction: the last syllable ed is often joined with the former by suppression of e; as, lov'd for loved; after c, ch, sh, f, k, x, and after the consonants f, th, when more strongly pronounced, and sometimes after m, n, r, if preceded by a short vowel, t is used in pronunciation, but very seldom in writing, rather than d; as plac't, snatch't, sish't, wak't, dwel't, smel't; for plac'd snatch'd, sish'd, wak'd, dwel'd, smel'd; or placed, snatched, sished, waked, dwelled, smelled. fished, waked, dwelled, smelled.

Those words which terminate in l or ll, or p, make their preterite in t, even in solemn language; as crept, felt, dwelt; fometimes after x, ed is changed into t;

as, vert: this is not constant.

A long vowel is often changed into a short one; thus, kept, slep., wept, crept, swept; from the verbs, to keep,

to fleep, to weep, to creep, to fweep.

Where d or t go before, the additional letter d or t, in this contracted form, coalefee into one letter with the radical dor t: if t were the radical, they coalesce into t;

but if d were the radical, then into d or t, as the o sit the other letter may be more easily pronounced read, led, spread, sled, sbred, bid, bid, cbid, fed, bled, b sped, strid, rid; from the verbs, to read, to lead, spread, to shed, to shed, to bide, to chide, to feed, to bleed, to spread, to bid, to bide, to chide, to ride. And thus, cast, burt, cost, burst, eat, beat. sweat, sit, quit, smit, writ, bit, hit, met, shot; from the verbs, to cast, to purt, to south, to surfly to eat, to lite, to sweat, to shoot. And in like manner, love feet, rent, girt; from the verbs, to lend, to send, to d, to gird.

The participle preterite or passive is often formed in

The participle preterite or passive is often formed in en, instead of ed; as been, taken Agiven, slain, known, from the verbs to be, to take, to give, to slay, to know.

Many words have two or more participles, as not only written, bitten, eaten, beaten, bidden, chidden, shotten, chosen; but likewise writ, bit, eat, beat, bid, chid, shot, chose, broke, are promiscuously used in the participle, from the verbs to write, to bite, to eat, to beat, to bide, to chide, to shoot, to choose, to break, and many such like.

In the same manner sown, shewn, bewn, mown, loaden, laden, as well as sow'd, shew'd, bew'd, mow'd, loaded, laded, from the verbs to sow, to shew, to bew, to mow, to load, or lade.

Concerning these double participles it is difficult to give any rule; but he shall seldom err who remembers, that when a verb has a participle distinct from its preterite, as write, wrote, written, that distinct participle is more proper and elegant, as The book is written, is better than The book is wrote, though wrote may be used in poetry.

There are other anomalies in the preterite.

1. Win, spin, begin, swim, strike, stick, sing, sting, sting, swing, drink, sink, shrink, stink, ring, wring, spring, swim, strike, stick, sing, sting, fing, ring, wring, spring, swing, drink, sink, shrink, stink, come, run, find, bind, grind, wind, both in the preterite imperfect and participle passive, give won, spun, begun, swum, struck, stuck, sing, stung, slung, rung, wrung, sprung, swung, drunk, sunk, sbrunk, bung, come, run, found, bound, ground, wound. And most of them are also formed in the preterite by a, as began, rang, sang, sprang, drank, came, ran, and some others; but most of these are now obsolete. Some in the participle passive likewise take en, as stricken, strucken, drunken. passive likewise take en, as stricken, strucken, drünken, bounden.

2. Fight, teach, reach, seek, beseech, catch, buy, bring, think, work, make fought, taught, raught, fought, befought, caught, bought, brought, thought, wrought.
But a great many of these retain likewise the regular form, as teached, reached, beseeched, catched, worked.

form, as teached, reached, befeeched, catched, worked.

3. Take, shake, forsake, wake, awake, stand, break, speak, bear, shear, swear, tear, weave, cleave, strive, thrive, drive, shine, rise, arise, smite, write, bide, abide, ride, choose, chase, tread, get, beget, forget, seethe, make in both preterite and participle took, forsook, woke, awoke, stood, broke, spoke, bore, shore, swore, tore, wore, wove, clove; strove, throve, drove, shone, rose, arose, smote, wrote, bede, abode, rode, chose, trode, get, begot, forgot, sod. But we say likewise, thrive, rise, smit; writ, abid, rid. In the preterite some are likewise formed by a, as brake, spake, bare, share, sware, tare, ware, clave, gat, begat, forget, and perhaps some others, but more rarely. In the participle passive are many of them formed by en, as taken, shaken, forsaken, broken, spoken, born, shorn, sworn, torn, worn, woven, cloven, thriven, driven, risen, smitten, ridden, chosen, trodden, gotten, begotten, forgotsmitten, ridden, chosen, trodden, gotten, begotten, forgotten, sodden. "And many do likewise retain the analogy in both, as waked, awaked, sheared, weaved, leaved, abiced, seethed.

Give, bid, sit, make in the preterite gave, bade, sate; in the participle p Tive, given, bidden, sitten; but 5 Draw, know, grow, 'row, blow, crow like a cock, fly, flax, fee, ly, make their preterite drew, knew, grew, threw, blew, crew, flew, flew, faw, lay; their participles passive by n, drawn, known, grown, thrown, blown, slown, slain, seen, lien, lain. Yet from slee is made fled; from go, went, from the old wend, and the participle gone.

Of DERIVATION.

Piur the English language may be more easily understood, it is nece y to enquire how its derivative words are deduced from their princitives and how the primitives are borrowed from other languages. In this enquiry, I shall sometimes copy Dr. Wallis, and tometimes endeavour to supply his defects, and rectify his errours.

Nouns are derived from verbs.

The thing implied in the verb as done or produced, is commonly enter the present of the verb; as, to love, love; to fright, a fright; to fight, a fight; or the pre-terite of the verb, as, to strike, I strick or strook, a stroke.

The action is the same with the participle present, as loving, frighting, fighting, striking.

The agent, or person acting, is denoted by the syllable er added to the verb, as lover, frighter, striker.

Substantives, adjectives, and sometimes other parts of speech, are changed into verbs: in which case the vowel is often lengthened, or the confonant foftened; as, a house, to bouse; brass, to braze; glass, to glaze; grafs, to graze; price, to prize; breath, to breathe; a fish, to fish; oyl, to oyl; further, to further; forward, to forward; hinder, to binder.

Sometimes the termination en is added, especially to adjectives; as, haste, to basten; length, to lengthen; strength, to strengthen; short, to shorten; sast, to fasten; white, to whiten; black, to blacken; hard, to barden;

foft, to foften.

From substantives are formed adjectives of plenty, by adding the termination y; as, a louse, lousy; wealth, wealthy; health, bealthy; might, mighty; worth, worthy; wit, witty; lust, lusty; water, watery; earth, earthy; wood, a wood, woody; air, airy; a heart, bearty; a hand, bandy.

From substantives are formed adjectives of plenty, by adding the termination ful, denoting abundance; as, joy, joyful; fruit, fruitful; youth, youthful; care, careful; use, useful; delight, delightful; plenty, plentiful; help, belpful.

Sometimes, in almost the same sense, but with some kind of diminution thereof, the termination fome is added, denoting fomething, or in fome degree; as, delight, delight some; game, gamesome; irk, irk some; burthen, burthen some; trouble, trouble some; light, light some; hand, bandsome; alone, lonesome; toil, toilsome.

On the contrary, the termination less added to substantives, makes adjectives signifying want; as, worthless, witless, beartless, joyless, careless, belpless. Thus comfort, comfortless; sap, sapless.

Privation or contrariety is very often denoted by the particle un prefixed to many adjectives, or in before words derived from the Latin; as, pleasant, unpleasant; wise, unwise; profitable, unprofitable; patient, impatient. Thus unworthy, unhealthy, unfruitful, unuseful, and many more.

The original English privative is un; but as we often borrow from the Latin, or its descendants, words already signifying privation, as inefficacious, impious, indiscreet, the inseparable particles un and in have fallen into consusion, from which it is not easy to disentangle

Un is prefixed to all words originally English, as untrue, untruth, untaught, unhandiome untaught, unband/ome.

Un is prefixed to all participles made privative adjectives, as unfeeling, unassifing, unaided, undelighted, unendeared.

Un ought never to be prefixed to a participle present, to mark a forbearance of action, as unsighing; but a privation of habit, as unpitying.

Un is prefixed to most substantives which have an English termination, as unfertileness, unperfectively, which, if they have borrowed terminations, take in or im, as infertility, imperfection; uncivil, incivility; unastive, inactivity.

In borrowing adjectives, if we receive them already compounded, it is usual to retain the particle prefixed, as indecency, inclegant, improper; but if we borrow the adjective, and add the privative particle, we commonly prefix un, as unpotite, ungallant.

The prepositive particles dis and mis, derived from the des and mes of the French, signif almost the same as in; yet dis rather imports contrariety than privation, sin e it answers to the Latin pre ion de. Mis infinuates fome error, and for the most part may be rendered by the Latin words male or perperam. To like, to dislike; honour, dishonour; to honour, to grace, to dishonour, to disgrace; to deign, to disdeign; chance, hap, mischange, mishap; to take, to mistake; deed, misdeed; to use, to misuse; to employ, to misemploy; to apply, to mis-

Words derived from Latin written with de or dis retain the same signification, as distinguish, distinguo; de-tratt, detraho; defame, defamo; detain, detineo.

The termination by added to substantives, and some-times to adjectives, forms adjectives that import some kind of similitude or agreement, being formed by contraction of lick or like.

A giant, giantly, giantlike; earth, earthly; heaven, beavenly; world, worldly; God, godly; good, goodly.

The fame termination ly added to adjectives, forms adverbs of like fignification; as, beautiful, beautifully; fweet, sweetly; that is, in a beautiful manner; with some degree of sweetness.

The termination is added to adjectives, imports diminution; and added to substantives, imports di-tude or tendency to a character; as, green, greenish; white, whitish; soft, softish; a thief, thievish; a wolf, wolf, to child; a child, childish.

We have forms of diminutives in substantives, though not frequent; as, a hill, a billock; a cock, a cockrel; a pike, pickrel; this is a French termination: a goofe, a gosling; this is a German termination: a lamb, a lambkin; a chick, a chicken; a man, a manikin; a pipe, a pipkin; and thus Halkin, whence the patronimick Hawkins, Wilkin, Thomkin, and others.

Yet still there is another form of diminution among the English, by lessening the sound itself, especially of vowels; as there is a form of augmenting them by enlarging, or even lengthening it; and that sometimes not so much by the change of the letters, as of their pronunciation; as, sup, sip, sop, sop, sop, sippet, where, besides the extenuation of the vowel, there is added the French termination et: top, tip; spit, spout; babe, baby, booby, summis; great pronounced long, especially if with a stronger sound, great; little pronounced long, lee-tle; ting, tang, tong, imports a succession of smaller and then greater sounds; and so in jingle, jangle, tingle, tangle, and many other made words, words,

Much bowever of this is arbitrary and fanciful, depending wholly on oral utterance, and therefore scarcely worthy the notice of Wallis.

Of concrete adjectives are made abstract substantives, by adding the termination ness, and a few in bood or bead, noting character or qualities; as, white, whiteness; hard, bardness; great, greatness; skilful, skilfulness, unskilfulness; godhead, manbood, maidenhead, widowbood, knighthood, prieshbood, likelbood, falsebood.

There are other abstracts, partly derived from adjectives, and partly from verbs, which are formed by the addition of the termination th, a small change being fometimes made; as, long, length; ftrong, strength; broad, wide, breadth, width; deep, depth; true, truth; warm, warmth; dear, dearth; flow, slowth; merry, mirth; heal, bealth; well, weal, wealth; dry, droughth; young, youth; and so moon, month.

Like these are some words derived from verbs; dy, death; till, tilth; grow, growth; mow, later mowth, after mowth; commonly spoken and written later math, after math; steal, stealth; bear, birth; rue, ruth; and probably earth from to ear or plow; fly, flight; weigh, weight; fray, fright; to draw, draught.

These should rather be written flighth, frighth, only that custom prevails, lest b should be twice repeated.

The same form retain faith, spight, wreathe, wrath, broth, froth, breath, sooth, worth, light, wight, and the like, whose primitives are either entirely obsolete, or seldom occur. Perhaps they are derived from fey or foy, spry, wry, wreak, brew, mow, fry, bray, say, work.

Some ending in ship imply an office, employment, or condition; as, kingship, wardship, guardianship, partnership, stewardship, headship, lordship.

Thus worship, that is, worthship; whence worshipful, to wor-

Some few ending in dom, rick, wick, do especially denote dominion, at least state or condition; as, kingdom; dukedom, earldom, princedom, popedom, christendom, freedom, wisdom, whoredom, bishoprick, bailywick.

Ment and age are plainly French terminations, and are of the same import with us as among them, scarcely ever occuring, except in words derived from the French, as, commandment, usage.

R F T H R M M A

There are in English often long trains of words allied by their meaning and derivation; as, to beat, a bat, batoon, a battle, a beetle, a battle-door, to batter, butter, a kind of glutinous composition for food. All these are of similar signification, and perhaps derived from the Latin batuo. Thus take, touch, tickle, tack, tackle; all imply a local conjunction, from the Latin tango, tetigi, tasum.

From two are formed twain, twice, twenty, twelve, twins, twine, twist, twist, twite, twist, twist, twist, twist, twist, twist.

The following remarks, extracted from Wallis, are ingenious, but of more subtlety than solidity, and such as perhaps might in every language be enlarged without end.

Sn usually implies the nose, and what relates to it: From the Latin nasus are derived the French nes and the English nose; and nesse, a promontory, as projecting like a nose. But as if from the confonants ns taken from nasus, and transposed, that they may the better correspond, in denotes nasus; and thence are derived many words that relate to the nose, as snout, sneeze, snore, snort, snear, snicker, snot, snivel, snite, inusse, snasse, snarse, snarse, snarse, snarse, snake, snake Sn usually implies the nose, and what relates to it: From the La-

Bl implies a blast; as, blow, blast, to blast, to blight, and, metaphorically, to blast one's reputation; bleat, bleak, a bleak place, to look bleak or weather-beaten, bleak, blay, bleach, bluster, blurt, blister, blab, bladder, bleb, blister, blabber-lip't, blubber-cheek't, bloted, blote-berrings, blast, blaze, to blow, that is, blossom, bloom; and perhaps blood and blust.

In the parties words of our tongue is to be found.

In the native words of our tongue is to be found a great agreement between the letters and the thing fignified; and therefore the founds of letters smaller, sharper, louder, closer, softer, stronger, clearer, more obscure, and more stridulous, do very often intimate the like effects in the things signified.

Thus words that begin with strinimate the force and effect of the thing signified, as if probably derived from seineum, or strenum; as, strong, strength, stream, strike, streake, stroke, stripe, strive, strife, struggle, strout, strate, strike, streake, stroke, stripe, strive, strife, struggle, strange, string, strange, strange, string, strange, strange, stride, strandele.

St in like manner implies strength, but in a less degree, so much only as is sufficient to preserve what has been already communicated, fruggle, strange, stride, straddle.

St in like manner implies strength, but in a less degree, so much only as is sufficient to preserve what has been already communicated, tather than acquire any new degree; as if it were derived from the Latin slo: for example, stand, slay, that is, to remain, or to prop; staff, slay, that is, to oppose; slop, to sluff, stisse, to stay, that is, to slop; a stay, that is, an obstacle; stick, stuster, stammer, stagger, stickle, stick, stake, a sharp pale, and any thing deposited at play; stock, stem, sting, to sting, slink, stitch, stud, stancbion, stub, stubble, to stub up, stump, whence stumble, stalk, to stalk, step, to stamp with the feet, whence to stamp, that is, to make an impression and a stamp; stow, to stow, to bestow, steward or stoward, stead, steady, steadfast, stable, a stable, a stall, to stall, stool, stall, still, stall, stallage, stall, stage, still, adj. and still adv. stale, stout, sturdy, stead, stoat, stallion, stiff, stark-dead, to starve with hunger or cold; stone, steel, stern, stanch, to stanch blood, to stare, steeph, steeple, stair, standard, a stated measure, stately. In all these, and perhaps some others, steening stare, stead, through, threat, threaten, thrall, throws.

Wr implies a more violent degree of motion, as throw, thrust, throng, throb, through, threat, threaten, thrall, throws.

Wr imply some sort of obliquity or distortion, as awry, to averathe, werest, wrestle, wring, wrong, wrinch, averach, wrangle, wrinkle, wrath, wreak, wrack, wretch, wrish, wreae, sweep, fwill, swin, swing, swist, sweep, sweat, swinkle, swing, swist, sweep, sweat, sweep, fwill, swin, swing, swist, sweep, sweat, sweep, swinkle, swing, swist, sweep, switch, swing.

Nor is there much difference of sm in smoothe, smug, smile, smil, smil, smile, small, smalk, smoother, smart, a smart blow properly signifies such a kind of stroke as with an originally silent motion implied in sm, proceeds to a quick violence, denoted by ar suddenly ended, as is shewn by t.

Cl denote a k

by t.

Cl denote a kind of adhesion or tenacity, as in cleave, clay, cling, elimb, clamber, clammy, class, to class, to clip, to clinch, cloak, clog, close, to close, a clod, a clot, as a clot of blood, clouted cream, a clutter, a cluster.

Sp implies a kind of dissipation or expansion, especially a quick one, particularly if there be an r, as if it were from sparge or separe: for example, spread, spring, spring, sprout, sprinkle, split, splinter, spill, spit, sputter, spatter.

Sl denotes a kind of silent falt, or a less observable motion; as in slime, slide, slip, sietper, sly, sleight, slit, slow, slack, slight, sling, slat.

solutions that the first and a late, a local, flight, fing, flap.

And so likewise ask, in crash, rash, gash, slash, clash, lash, slash, plash, trash, indicates something acting more nimbly and sharply. But ush, in crush, rush, gush, slush, blush, brush, bush, push, implies something as acting more obtusely and dully. Yet in both there is indicated a fwift and sudden motion, not instantaneous, but gradual, by the continued sound st.

Thus in sling, sling, sling, sling, cling, sing, wring, sting, the tingling of the termination ng, and the sharpness of the vowel i, imply the continuation of a very slender motion or tremor, at length indeed vanishing, but not suddenly interrupted. But in tink, wink, sink, clink, chink, thank, that end in a mute consonant, there is also Indicated a sudden ending.

If there be an i, as in jingle, tingle, tinkle, mingls, sprinkle, two inkle, there is implied a frequency, or iteration of small acts. And the same frequency of acts, but less subtile by reason of the clearer vowel a, is indicated in jargle, tangle, spangle, mangle, averagle, be angle, dangle; as also in mamble, grumble, jumble, tumble, stumble, stumble, sumble, sum tomething obscure or obtunded; and a congeries of consonants mbl, denotes a confused kind of rolling or tumbling, as in samble, seamble, feramble, wamble, amble; but in these there is something acute.

In nimble, the acuteness of the vowel denotes celerity. In sparkle, sp denotes dissipation, ar an acute crackling, k a sudden interruption, I a frequent iteration; and in like manner in sprinkle, unless in may imply the subtility of the dissipated guttules. Thick and thin differ, in that the former ends with an obtase consonant, and the latter with an acute.

with an acute.

In like manner, in fqueek, fqueak, fqueal, fquall, baul, wraul, yaul, fpaul, fcreek, fbrick, fbril, fbarp, fbrivel, wrinkle ik, craft, claft, gnaft, plaft, cruft, buft, biffe, fife, whiff, fo, jarr, burl, curl, whirl, buz, bufte, fpindle, dwindle, twine, twi and in many more, we may observe the agreement of such fort of sounds with the things signified: and this so frequently happens, that scarce any language which I know can be compared with oars. So that one monofyllable word, of which kind are almost all ours, emphatically expresses what in other languages can sea ce be explained but by compounds, or decompounds, or sometimes a tedious circumlocution.

We have many words borrowed from the Latin; but the greatest part of them were communicated by the intervention of the French; as grace, face, elegant, elegance, resemble.

Some verbs, which feem borrowed from the Latin, are formed from the present tense, and some from the fupines.

From the present are formed spend, expend, expendo; conduce, conduco; despise, despicio; approve, approbo; conceive, concipio.

From the supines, supplicate, supplico; demonstrate; demonstro; dispose, dispono; expatiate, expatior; suppress, supprimo; exempt, eximo.

Nothing is more apparent, than that Wallis goes too far in quest of originals. Many of these which seem selected as immediate descendents from the Latin, are apparently French, as conceive, approve, expose, exempt.

Some words purely French, not derived from the Latin, we have transferred into our language; as, garden, garter, buckler, to advance, to cry, to plead, from the French jardin, jartier, bouclier, avancer, cryer, plaider; though indeed, even of these, part is of Latin original.

As to many words which we have in common with the Germans, it is doubtful whether the old Teutons borrowed them from the Latins, or the Latins from the Teutons, or both had them from fome common original; as, wine, vinum; wind, ventus; went, veni; way, via; wall, vallum; wallow, volvo; wool, vellus; will, volo; way, via; wall, vallum; wallow, volvo; wool, vellus; will, volo; worm, vermis; worth, virtus; wasp, vespa; day, dies; draw, traho; tame, domo, δαμάω; yoke, jugum, ζεῦγος; ower, upper, super, super, am, sum, sum; break, frango; fly, volo; blow, so. I make no doubt but the Teutonick is more ancient than the Latin: and it is no less certain, that the Latin, which borrowed a great number of words, not only from the Greek, especially the Æolick, but from other neighbouring languages, as the Oscan and others, which have long become obsolete, received not a few from the Teutonick. It is certain, that the English, German, and other Teutonick languages, retained some derived from the Greek, which the Latin has not as certain, that the English, German, and other Teutonick languages, retained some derived from the Greek, which the Latin has not; as path, pfad, ax, achs, mit, foad, pfurd, daughter, tochter, mickle, mingle, moon, fear, grave, graff, to grave, to scrape, whole, heal, from wayos, aξίνη, μίας, woρθμος, μιγάλος, μιγώω, μῆνη, ξῆξός, γεάδρο, ὅλος, ειλέω. Since they received these immediately from the Grecks, without the intervention of the Latin language, why may not other words be derived immediately from the same fountain, though they be likewise found among the Latins.

Our ancestors were studious to form borrowed words, however long, into monofyllables; and not only cut off the formative terminations, but cropped the first syllable, especially in words beginning with a vowel; and rejected not only vowels in the middle, but likewise consonants of a weaker sound, retaining the stronger, which feem the bones of words, or changing them for others of the same organ, in order that the found might become the fofter; but especially transposing their order, that they might the more readily be pronounced without the intermediate vowels. For example, in expendo, spend; exemplum, sample; excipio, scape; extraneus, strange; extractum, stretch'd; excrucio, to screw; exscorib, to scour; excorio, to scourge; excortico, to scraich; and others beginning with ex: as also, emendo, to mend; episcopus, bishop; in Danish Bisp; epistole, pistle; hospitale, spittle; Hispania, Spain; historial ria, ftory.

Many of these etymologies are doubtful, and some evidently mistook this liberty of maiming, taking away, changing, transposing, and softening them.

But while we derive these from the Latin, I do not mean of ay, that many of them did not immediately come to us from the Saxon, Damish, Dutch, and Teutonick languages, and other dialects, and some taken more lately from the French or Italians, or Spania'ds.

The same word, according to its different significations, oft n has a different origin; as, to bear a burden, from sero; but to bear, whence birth, born, bairn, comes from parin; and a bear, at least if it be of Latin original, from seron, and likewise to seroh. To stell is from syllaba; but spell, an inchantment, by which it is believed that the boundaries are so fixed in lands, that none can pass them against the master's will, from expello; and spell, a messenger, from epissua; whence gispel, good-spel, or god-spell. Thus freese, or freeze, from frigeso; but freeze, an architectonic word, from zoshorus; but freese, for cloth, from Frisia, or perhaps from frigesco, as being more sit than any other for keeping out the cold.

There are many words among us, even monosyllables compounded of two or more words, at least serving instead of compounds, and comprising the signification of more words than one; as, from serip and roll comes seroll; from proud and dance, prance; from stot of the verb stay or stand and out, is made stout; from stout and bardy, sturdy; from sp of spit or spew, and out, comes spout; from the same sp, with the termination in, is spin; and adding out, spin out; and from the same sp, with it, is spit, which only differs from spout in that it is smaller, and with less noise and force; but sputter is, because of the obscure u. something between spit and spout; and by reason of adding r, it intimates a frequent iteration and noise, but obscurely consuled: whereas spatter, on account of the shaper and clearer vowel a, intimates a more distinct noise, in which it chiefly differs from sputter. From the same sp, and the termination sark, comes spark, signifying a single emission of fire with a noise; namely, sp the emission, ar the more acute noise, and k, the mute consonant, intimates its being suddenly terminated; but adding l, is made the frequentative sparkle. The same sp, by adding r, that is spr, implies a more lively impetus of dissing or expanding itself; to which adding the termination ing, it becomes spring; its vigour spr imports, its sharpness the termination ing, and lassly in acute and tremulous, ends in the mute consonant g, denotes the sudden ending of any motion, that it is meant in its primary signification, of a single, not a complicated exilition. Hence we call spring whatever has an elastick force; as also a sountain of water, and thence the origin of any thing; and to spring, to germinate; and spring, one of the sour seasons. From the same spr and out, is formed spring, one of the sour seasons. From the same spr and out, is formed spring, one of the source spring; is the difference: sprout, of

In these observations it is easy to discover great sagacity and great extravagance, an ability to do much defeated by the defire of doing more than enough. It may be remarked,

1. That Wallis's derivations are often fo made, that by the same licence any language may be deduced from any other.

2. That he makes no distinction between words imm diately derived by us from the Latin, and those who being copied from other languages, can therefore afford no example of the genius of the English language, or its laws of derivation.

3. That he derives from the Latin, often with great harshness and violence, words apparently Teutonick; and therefore, according to his own declaration, probably older than the tongue to which he refers them.
4. That some of his derivations are apparently erroneous.

SYNTAX.

The established practice of grammarians requires that I should here treat of the Syntax; but our language has so little instection, or variety of terminations, that its construction neither requires nor admits many rules. Wallis therefore has totally omitted it; and Johnson, whose desire of following the writers upon the learned languages made him think a syntax indispensably necessary, has published such petty observations as were better omitted.

The verb, as in other languages, agrees with the nominative in number and person; as, Thou fliest from good; He runs to death.

Our adjectives and pronouns are invariable.

Of two substantives the noun possessive is the geni-tive; as, His father's glory; The sun's heat. Verbs transitive require an oblique case; as, He loves me; You fear bim.

All prepositions require an oblique case: He gave this to me; He took this from me; He says this of me; He came with me,

PROSODY.

It is common for those that deliver the grammar of modern languages, to omit their Prosody. So that of the Italians is neglected by Buomartei; that of the French by Desmarais; and that of the English by Wallis, Cooper, and even by Johnson though a poet But as the laws of metre are included in the idea of a grammar, I have thought it proper to insert them.

Profody comprises orthoephy, or the rules of pronunciation; and orthometry, or the laws of verfification.

PRONUNCIATION is just, when every letter has its proper found, and when every fyllable has its proper accent, or, which in English versification is the same, its proper quantity.

The founds of the letters have been already explained; and rules for the accent or quantity are not easily to be given, being subject to innumerable exceptions. Such however as I have read or formed, I shall here propose.

t. Of diffyllables formed by affixing a termination, the former syllable is commonly accented, as, childish, kingdom, áctest, ácted, tóilsome, lóver, scóffer, fairer, fóremost, zéasous, fúlness, gódly, méekly, ártist.

2. Diffyllables formed by prefixing a syllable to the radical word, have commonly the accent on the latter;

as, to begét, to beseém, to bestéw.
3. Of diffyllables, which are at once nouns and verbs, the verb has commonly the accent on the latter, and the noun on the former syllable; as, to descant, a descant; to cement, a cement; to contract, a contract.

This rule has many exceptions. Though verbs seldom have their accent on the former, yet nouns often have it on the latter syllable; as, delight, perfume.

4. All diffyllables ending in y, as cranny; in our, as labour, favour; in ow, as willow, wállow, except allów; in le, as báttle, bible; in ish, as bánish; in ck, as cámbrick, cássock; in ter, as to bátter; in age, as courage; in en, as fasten; in et, as quiet, accent the former syllable.

5. Diffyllable nouns in er, as canker, butter, have the accent on the former fyllable.

6. Diffyllable verbs terminating in a confonant and e final, as comprise, escápe; or having a diphthong in the last syllable, as appéase, revéal; or ending in two confonants, as atténd; have the accent on the latter syllable.

7. Diffyllable nouns having a diphthong in the latter fyllable, have commonly their accent on the latter fyllable, as applause; except words in ain, certain, mountain.

8. Triffyllables formed by adding a termination, or prefixing a syllable, retain the accent of the radical ord, as loveliness, tenderness, contemner, wagonner, phy-Ical, bespåtter, commenting, commending, assurance.
9. Trissyllables ending in ous, as grácious, árduous; in al, as capital; in ion, as mention, accent the first.

10. Trissyllables ending in ce, ent, and ate, accent the first syllable, as countenance, continence, armament, imminent, élegant, propagate, except they be derived from words having the accent on the last, as connivence, acquáintance; or the middle fyllable hath a vowel before two confonants, as promulgate.

11. Triffyllables ending in y, as éntity, spécify, liberty, viĉīory, subsidy, commonly accent the first syllable.

12. Triffyllables in re or le accent the first syllable, as légible, théatre, except disciple, and some words which have a position, as example, epistle.

13. Trissyllables in ude commonly accent the first syllable, as plénitude.

14. Triffyllables ending in ator or atour, as créatour, or having in the middle syllable a diphthong, as endeávour; or a vowel before two consonants, as doméstick, accent the middle fyllable.

15. Triffyllables that have their accent on the last syllable are commonly French, as acquiesce, repartée, magazine, or words formed by prefixing one or two fyllables to an acute fyliable, as immature, overcharge.

16. Polyfyllables, or words of more than three fyllables.

- lables, follow the accent of the words from which they are derived, as arrogating, continency, incontinently, commendable, communicablenefs.
- 17. Words in ion have the accent upon the antepenult, as salvátion, perturbátion, concôction; words in
- atour or ator on the penult, as dedicator.

  18. Words ending in le commonly have the accent on the first fyllable, as ámicable, unless the second fyllable have a vowel before two consonants, as combustible.
- 19. Words ending in ous have the accent on the ante-
- penult, as uxórious, volúptuous.
  20. Words ending in ly have their accent on the antepenult, as pufillanimity, activity.

These rules are not advanced as complete or infallible, but proposed as useful. Almost every rule of every language has its exceptions: and in English, as in other tongues, much must be learned by example and authority. Perhaps more and better rules may be given that have escaped my observation.

VERSIFICATION is the arrangement of a certain number of fyllables according to certain laws.

The feet of our verses are either iamb a, as aloft, create; or trochaick, as bóly, lófty.

Our iambick measure comprise verses

Of four fyllables,

Most good, most fair, Or things as rare, To call you's loft; For all the cost Words can bestow, So poorly flow Upon your praise, That all the ways Sense hath, come short.

Drayton.

With ravish'd ears The monarch hears.

Dryden.

Of fix,

This while we are abroad, Shall we not touch our lyre? Shall we not fing an ode? Shall that holy fire, In us that strongly glow'd, In this cold air expire?

Though in the utmost peak A while we do remain, Amongst the mountains bleak, Expos'd to fleet and rain, No sport our hours shall break, To exercise our vein.

Who though bright Phœbus' beams Refresh the southern ground, And though the princely Thames With beauteous nymphs abound, And by old Camber's streams Be many wonders found;

Yet many rivers clear Here glide in filver swathes, And what of all most dear, Buxton's delicious baths, Strong ale and noble chear, T' affwage breem winter's scathes.

In places far or near, Or famous, or obscure, Where wholesom is the air, Or where the most impure, All times, and every where, The muse is still in ure.

Drayton.

Of eight, which is the usual measure for short poems,

> And may at last my weary age Find out the peaceful hermitage, The hairy gown, and mostly cell, Where I may fit, and nightly spell Of ev'ry star the sky doth shew, And ev'ry herb that fips the dew.

Milton.

Of ten, which is the common measure of heroick and tragick poetry.

Full in the midst of this created space, Betwixt heav'n, earth, and skies, there stands a place Confining on all three; with triple bound; Whence all things, though remote, are view'd around,

And thither bring their undulating found. The palace of loud Fame, her feat of pow'r, Plac'd on the summit of a lofty tow'r; A thousand winding entries long and wide Receive of fresh reports a flowing tide.

NGLIS H T ON GU E.

A thouland crannies in the walls are made; Nor gate nor bars exclude the bufy trade. Tis built of brass, the better to diffuse The spreading founds, and multiply the news; Where echo's in repeated echo's play: A mark for ever full; and open night and day. Nor filence is within, nor voice express, But a deas noise of founds that never cease; Confus'd, sad chiding, like the hollow rore Of tides, remeding from th' infulted shore; Or like the broken thunder, heard from far, When Jove to distance drives the rolling war. The courts are xill'd with a tumultuous din Of crouds, or iffuing forth, or entring in: A thorough-fare of news; where some devise Things never heard, some mingle truth with lies The troubled air with empty sounds they beat, Intent to hear, and eager to repeat. Dryden.

In all these measures the accents are to be placed on even fyllables; and every line confidered by itself is more harmonious, as this rule is more strictly obferved.

Our trochaick measures are

Of three fyllables,

Here we may Think and pray, Before death Stops our breath: Other joys Are but toys.

Of five,

In the days of old, Stories plainly told, Lovers felt annoy.

Of feven,

Fairest piece of welform d earth, Urge not thus your haughty birth.

In these measures the accent is to be placed on the odd fyllables.

These are the measures which are now in use, and above the rest those of seven, eight, and ten syllables. Our ancient poets wrote verses sometimes of twelve syllables, as Drayton's Polyolbion.

Of all the Cambrian shires their heads that bear so high, And farth'st survey their soils with an ambitious eye, Mervinia for her hills, as for their matchless crowds, The nearest that are said to kiss the wand'ring clouds, Especial audience craves, offended with the throng, That she of all the rest neglected was so long; Alledging for herself, when through the Saxons pride, The godlike race of Brute to Severn's setting side Were cruelly inforc'd, her mountains did relieve Those whom devouring war else every where did grieve.

And when all Wales beside (by fortune or by might) Unto her ancient foe refign'd her ancient right, A constant maiden still she only did remain, The last her genuine laws which stoutly did retain.

And as each one is prais'd for peculiar things;

So only she is rich, in mountains, meres, and springs,

And holds herself as great in her superfluous waste, As others by their towns, and fruitful tillage grac'd.

And of fourteen, as Chapman's Homer.

And as the mind of fuch a man, that hath a long way gone; And either knoweth not his way, or else would let alone His purpos'd journey, is distract

The verse of twelve lines, called an Alexandrine, is now only used to diversify heroick lines.

Waller was smooth, but Dryden tanght to join The varying verse, the full resounding line, The long majestick march, and energy divine.

The pause in the Alexandrine must be at the fixth syllable.

The verse of fourteen syllables is now broken into a fost lyrick measure of verses, confisting alternately of eight syllables and fix.

> Sheuto receive thy radiant name, Selects a whiter space.

When all shall praise, and ev'ry lay Devote a wreath to thee, That day, for come it will, that day Shall I lament to see.

We have another measure very quick and lively, and therefore much used in songs, which may be called the anapestick, in which the accent refts upon every third fyllable.

May I góvern my pássions with ábsolute swáy, And grow wiser and bétter as life wears awáy.

In this measure a syllable is often retrenched from the first foot, as Diógenes fúrly and proúd:

I think not of I'ris, nor I'ris of mé.

These measures are varied by many combinations, and sometimes by double endings, either with or without rhyme, as in the heroick measure.

> 'Tis heav'n itself that points out an hereafter, And intimates eternity to man.

So in that of eight fyllables.

They neither added nor confounded, They neither wanted nor abounded.

In that of feven,

For refistance I could fear none, But with twenty ships had done, What thou, brave and happy Vernon, Haft atchiev'd with fix alone.

In that of fix, 'Twas when the feas were roaring, With hollow blafts of wind, A damfel lay deploring, All on a rock reclin'd.

In the anapestick, When terrible tempests assail us, And mountainous billows affright, Nor power nor wealth can avail us. But skilful industry steers right.

To these measures, and their laws, may be reduced every species of English verse.

Our versification admits of few licences, except a synalapha, or elision of e in the before a vowel, as th' eternal; and more rarely of o in to, as t'accept; and a synæresis, by which two short vowels coalesce into one syllable, as question, special; or a word is contracted by the expulsion of a short vowel before a liquid, as av'rice, temp'rance.

Thus have I collected rules and examples, by which the English language may be learned, if the reader be already acquainted with grammatical terms, or taught by a master to those that are more ignorant To have written a grammar for such as are not yet initiated in the schools, would have been tedious, and perhaps at lait meffectual.

DICTIONARY

OF THE

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The first letter of the European alphabets, has, in the English language, three different sounds, which may be termed the broad, open, and slender.

The broad found, refembling that of the German a, is found in many of our monofyllables, as all, wall, malt, falt; in which a is pronounced as au in cause, or are in law.

Many of these words are reasonable writer in the law. Many of these words were anciently written with au, as fault, waulk; which happens to be still retained in fault. This was probably the ancient found of the Saxons, fince it is

A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c.

A spen, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c.

A slender or close, is the peculiar a of the English language, refembling the found of the French e masculine, or diphthong at in the contract of the peculiar and the transfer or close, a middle sound between them. in pais, or perhaps a middle found between them, or between the a and e; to this the Arabic a is faid nearly to approach. Of this found we have examples in the words place, face, waste, and all those that terminate in atien, as, relation, nation, generation.

A.is fhort, as, glass, grass; or long, as, glaze, graze: it is marked long, generally, by an e final, plane, or by an i added, as,

A, an article set before nouns of the singular number; a man, a tree; denoting the number one, as, a man is coming, that is, no more than one; or an indefinite indication, as, a man may come this way; that is, any man. This article has no plural fignification. Before a word beginning with a vowel, it is written an, as, an ox, an egg, ot which a is the contraction.

A is sometimes a noun; as, a great A, a little a. A is placed before a participle, or participial noun; and is confidered by Wallis as a contraction of at, when it is put before a word denoting some action not yet finished; as, I am a walking. It also feems to be anciently contracted from at, when placed before local furnames; as, Thomas a Becket. In other cases, it feems to fignify to, like the French à.

A hunting Chloë went.

They go a begging to a bankrupt's door.

Dryden's Hind and Panth.

To ABA'TE. [In common law.]

It is in law used both actively and neuterly; as, to abate a casse, to beat it down. To abate a writ, is, by some exception, to deseat or overthrow it. A stranger abateth, that is, entereth upon a house or land void by the death of him that last possessed it, before the heir take his possessed in, and so keepeth him out. Wherefore, as he that putteth out him in possessed it is said to disselve; so he that steppeth in between the former possessed it is faid to disselve; is said to abate. In the neuter signification thus; The writ of the demandment shall abate, that is, shall be disabled, frustrated, or overthrown. The appeal abateth by covin, that is, that the accusation is deseated by deceit. Covol.

To ABA'TE. [In horsemanship.] A horse is said to abate or take down his curvets, when working upon curvets, he puts his two hind-legs to the ground both at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times.

A'BSOLUTENESS. n. s. [from absolute.]

1. Completeness.

2. Freedom from dependance, or limits.

The absoluteness and illimitedness of his commission was generally much spoken of. Clarendon, b. viii.

There is nothing that can raise a man to that generous abfoluteness of condition, as neither to cringe, to sawn, or to depend meanly; but that which gives him that happiness within himself, for which men depend upon others. South's Serm,

3. Despoticism. He kept a strait hand on his nobility, and chose rather to advance clergymen and lawyers, which were more obsequious to him, but had less interest in the people; which made for his abjoluteness, but not for his safety.

Bacon's Henry VII. his abjolutiness, but not for his safety... ABSOLU'TION. n. f. [absolutio, Lat.]

1. Acquittal.

Absolution, in the civil law, imports a full acquittal of a person by some final sentence of law; also, a temporary discharge of his farther attendance upon a mesne process, through charge of his farther attendance upon a messe process, through a failure or defect in pleading; as it does likewise in the canori law, where, and among divines, it likewise signifies a relaxation of him from the obligation of some sentence pronounced either in a court of law, or esse in fore panientials. Thus there is, in this kind of law, one kind of absolution, termed judicial, and another, stiled a declaratory or extrajudicial absolution.

Aylisse's Parergon Juris Canonici.

There, many a flow'r abstersive grew,
Thy fav'rite flow'rs of yellow hue.

A'BSTINENCE. n. s. [abstinentia, Lat.]

1. Forbearance of any thing; with the particle from.

Because the abstinence from a present pleasure, that offers itself, is a pain, nay, oftentimes a very great one: it is no wonder that that operates after the same manner pain does, and lessens, in our thoughts, what is suture; and so forces us. as lessens, in our thoughts, what is suture; and so forces us, as it were blindfold into its embraces.

Locke.

2. Fasting, or forbearance of necessary food. It is generally distinguished from temperance, as the greater degree from the less; sometimes as single performances from habits; as, a day of abstinence, and a lite of temperance.

[In law.] It is used with the preposition against before the perfon, and for before the thing.

Actions are personal, real, and mixt: action personal belongs to a man against another, by reason of any contract, of-fence, or cause, of like force with a contract or offence made or done by him or some other, for whose fact he is to answer. Action real is given to any man against another, that possesses the thing required or sued for in his own name, and no other man's. Action mixt is that which lies as well against or for the thing which we seek, as against the person that hath it; called mix', because it hath a mixt respect both to the thing and to the person the person.

Action is divided into civil, penal, and mixt. Action civil is that which tends only to the recovery of that which is due to us; as, a fum of money formerly lent. Action penal is that which aims at some penalty or punishment in the party sued, be it corporal or pecuniary: as, in common law, the next friends of a man feloniously slain shall pursue the law against the murderer. Assign mixt is that which seeks both the thing whereof we are deprived, and a penalty also for the unjust detaining of the same.

Action upon the case, is an action given for redress of wrongs done without force against any man, by law not specially provided for.

Action upon the statute, is an action brought against a man upon breach of a statute.

A'IRPUMP. n. f. [from air and punp.]

A machine by whose means the air is exhausted out of proper vessels. The principle on which it is built, is the elasticity of the air; as that on which the water pump is founded, is on the gravity of the air. The invention of this curious instrument is ascribed to Otto de Guerick, consul of Magdebourg. who exhibited his first publick experiments before the emperour and the states of Germany, in 15:4 But his machine laboured under several defects, in the force necessary to work it, which was very great, and the progress very slow; besides, it was to under several desects, in the force necestary to work it, which was very great, and the progress very flow; besides, it was to be kept under water, and allowed of no change of subjects for experiments. However, Mr. Boyle, with the affistance of Dr. Hooke, removed several of these inconveniencies; though, still, the working of this pump was laborious, by reason of the pressure of the atmosphere at every exsuction, after a vacuum was nearly obtained. This labour has been since removed by Mr. Howelsham, who by adding a second barrel and niften to sife Hawksbee; who, by adding a second barrel and piston, to rise as the other sell, and fall as it rose, made the pressure of the atmosphere on the descending one, of as much service as it was of differvice in the ascending one. Vream made a further improvement in Hawksbee's air-pump, by reducing the alternate motion of the hand and winch to a circular one. Chambers.

For the air that, in exhausted receivers of air-pumps, is exhaled from minerals, and flesh, and fruits, and liquors, is as exhaled from minerals, and flesh, and fruits, and liquors, is as true and genuine as to elasticity and density, or rarefaction, as that we respire in; and yet this factitious air is so far from being sit to be breathed in, that it kills animals in a moment, even sooner than the very absence of all air, or a vacuum itself.

The origin of this art is very obscure. It was in use, however, among the Arabs, long before it came into this part of the world; and they are supposed to have borrowed it from the Persians, and the Persians from the Indians. The first Greek author of already was Diophantus, who about the world? gebra was Diophantus, who, about the year 800, wrote thirteen books. In 1494, Lucas Pacciolus, or Lucas de Burgos, a cordelier, printed a treatise of algebra, in Italian, at Venice. He says, that algebra came originally from the Arabs, and never mentions Diophantus; which makes it probable, that that authors were not yet known in Europe; whose method was very thour was not yet known in Europe; whose method was very different from that of the Arabs, observed by Pacciolus and his first European sollowers. His algebra goes no farther than simple and quadratick equations; and only some of the others advanced to the solution of cubick equations. After several improvements by Vieta, Oughtred, Harriot, Descartes; Sir Isaac Newton brought this art to the height at which it still continues.

Pound an almond, and the clear white colour will be altered into a dirty one, and the sweet taste into an oily one. Locke.

A'LMOND TREE. n. f. [amygdalus, Lat.]
It has leaves and flowers very like those of the peach tree, but the fruit is longer and more compressed; the outer green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the she is not so rugged.

The species are, 1. The common large almond. 2. The sweet almond, with tender shells. 3. The bitter almond. 4. The white flowering almond.

The three first forts are chiefly cultivated in England, for the beauty of their flowers; and the first fort yields large quantities of fruit yearly, little inferiour to what we receive from abroad, if not kept too long. They are propagated in July, by inoculating a bud into a plum flock, for wet ground, or an almond or peach flock for dry. The fourth is a greater curiosity; it will not succeed on a plum, but must be budded on a peach or Millar:

A'LMUG TRER. n. f. A tree mentioned in scripture.

Of its wood were made musical instruments, and it was used also in rails, or in a staircase. The Rabbins generally render it coral, others ebony, brazil, or pine. In the Septuagint it is translated wrought wood; and in the Vulgate, Ligna Thyina. But coral could never answer the purposes of the almugim; the pine-tree is too common in Judea to be imported from Ophir; and the thyinum, or citron-tree, much esteemed by the ancients for its fragrance and beauty, came from Mauritania. By the wood almugim, or algumim, or, simply, gummim, taking al for a kind of article, may be understood oily and gummy forts of wood, and particularly the trees which produce gum ammoniac, or gum arabick; and is, perhaps, the same with the shittim-wood mentioned by Moses.

ALOES. n. s. [Dink, as it is supposed.] A term applied to three different things.

A precious wood used, in the East, for perfumes, of which the best fort is of higher price than gold, and was the most valuable present given by the king of Siam, in 1686, to the king of France. It is called Tombac, and is the heart, or innermost part of the alestness the most of the alestness the state of the part of the aloetree; the next part of which is called Calembac, which is fometimes imported into Europe, and, though of inferiour value to the Tambac, is much esteemed: the part next the bark is termed, by the Portuguese, Par d'aquila, or eaglewood; but some account the eagle wood not the outer part of the Tambac, but another species. Our knowledge of this wood is yet very impersect.

The species are 39: 1. The common large American alee.

The narrow-leaved alee, from Vera Cruz. 3. The American alee, which produces young plants out of the flower stems, &c.

Many of these plants, in English gardens, are natives of the East and West Indies: but the most curious are brought from East and West Indies; but the most curious are brought from the Cape of Good Hope.

The first of these aloes is very hardy, and has endured the air, in mild winters, in a very dry soil, and under a south wall; but they may be kept in a common greenhouse, giving them very little moisture in winter. The other sorts are preserved in an airy glass-case, with a stove. The aloes are all increased by off-sets.

Most of the African species, after the second, third, or south wear's growth, produce sowers with us annually; but the Ame-

A'LUM. n. f. [alumen, Lat.]

A kind of mineral falt, of an acid taste, leaving in the mouth a tense of sweetness, accompanied with a considerable degree of aftringency. The ancient naturalists allow of two forts of a l·m, natural and factitious. The natural is found in the island of Milo, being a kind of whitish stone, very light, friable, and porous, and streaked with filaments resembling silver. The factitious alum is prepared in different manners, according to the different materials of which it is made. Hence arise red, Roman, and citron alums; also plumose, saccharine, and burnt alums. England, Italy, and Flanders, are the countries where alum is principally produced; and the English roche-alum is made from a bluish mineral stone, frequent in the hills of Yorkthire and Lancashire. Alum is used in medicine as an absorbent, but being apt to excite vomiting, it is seldom prescribed inwardly. It is used outwardly in aftringent lotions, and is an ingredient in several dentifrices and cosmeticks. It is a principal ingredient in dying and colouring; neither of which can be well p iformed without it. It ferves to bind the colour upon the ft.fr., and has the same uses there, that gum water and glutinous oils have in painting. It also disposes stuffs to take the colour, and adds a degree of brifkness and delicacy to it. This effect of alum feems to proceed from its flyptick or aftringent quality, by which it binds the finer parts of colours together, and prevents their exhaing. Hence also it preserves paper, that has been dipped in its water, from finking when wrote upon.

Saccharine alum bears a near refemblance to fugar, and is a composition of common alum, with rose-water and whites of eggs boiled together, to the confiftence of a paste, and thus moulded at pleasure. As it cools, it grows hard as a stone, and is used as a cosmetick.

Burnt alum is alum calcined over the fire, and thus rendered whiter, more light, and more easily pulverized.

Plum fe cr jlume alum is a fort of faline mineral stone, of various colour most commonly white hard in a superior stone.

rious colour, most commonly white, bordering on green, refembling Venetian tale, except that, instead of scales, it rises in threads or fibres, resembling those of a feather; whence its name from , luma, a feather. Some will have this to be the laris amian hus of the ancients.

AMBA'SSADOUR. n. s. [ambassader, Fr. embaxador, Span.
It is, written differently, as it is supposed to come from the French or Spanish language; and the original derivation being uncertain, it is not easy to settle its orthography. Some derive it from the Hebrew and to tell, and and a messes; others from ambassas, which, in the old Gaulish, signifized a servant; whence ambassas, in low Latin, is found to signify fervice, and ambassas, a servant; others deduce it from ambassat, in old Teutonick, fignifying a government, and Juntus mentions a possibility of its descent from avasaive; and others from am for ad, and bassus, low, as supposing the act of sending an ambassadour, to be in some sort an act of submission. All these derivations lead to write ambaffadour, not embaffadour.] A person sent in a publick manner from one sovereign power to another, and supposed to represent the power from which he is sent. The person of an ambassadour is inviolable.

Ambassador is, in popular language, the general name of a messenger from a sovereign power, and sometimes, ludicrously, from common persons. In the juridical and formal language, it signifies particularly a minister of the highest rank residing in another country, and is distinguished from an envoy, who is of

A'MBER. n. f. [from ambar, Arab. whence the lower writers formed ambar um.]

A yellow transparent substance of a gummous or bituminous consistence, but refinous taste, and a smell like oil of turpentine; chiefly found in the Baltick sea, along the coasts of Prusfia. Some naturalists refer it to the vegetable, others to the mineral, and some even to the animal kingdom. Pliny describes it as a refinous juice, oozing from aged pines and firs, and discharged thence into the sea; where, undergoing some alteration, it is thrown, in this form, upon the shores of Prussia, which lie very low. He adds, that it was hence the ancients gave it the denomination of succinum, from succus, juice. This opinion of the ancient naturalist is confirmed by the observation of many of the moderns, particularly Father Camelli. Philos. Transat. No 290. Some have imagined it a concretion of the tears of birds: others, the urine of a heaft: others, the sum of the lake birds; others, the urine of a beast; others, the scum of the lake Cephifis, near the Atlantick; others, a congelation formed in the Baltick, and in some fountains, where it is found swimming like pitch. Others suppose it a bitumen trickling into the sea from subterraneous sources; but this opinion is also discarded, as good amber having been found in digging at a considerable distance from the sea, as that gathered on the coast. Boerhaave ranks it with camphire, which is a concrete oil of aromatick plants, elaborated by heat into a crystalline form. fumes all figures in the ground; that of a pear, an almond, a fumes all figures in the ground; that of a pen, pea; and, among others, there have been found letters very well pea; and, among others, there have been found letters very well pea; and Arabick characters. Within formed, and even Hebrew and Arabick characters. fome pieces of amber have been found leaves, and infects included; which feems to indicate, either that the amber was originally in a fluid state, or, that having been exposed to the sun, it was softened, and rendered susceptible of the leaves and insects. Amber, when rubbed, draws or attracts bodies to it; and, by friction, is brought to yield light pretty copiously in the dark. Some diffinguish amber into yellow, white, brown, and black: but the two latter are supposed to be of a different nature and denomination; the one called jet, the other ambergris. The white is most valued for medicinal uses, and the yellow for being wrought into beads and toys, because of its transparency. Trev. Chamb.

Liquid amber, is a kind of native balsam or resin, like turpentine; clear, reddish, or yellowish; of a pleasant smell, almost like ambergris. It slows from an incision made in the bark of a fine large tree in New Spain, called by the natives ofosol; but it hardens, as it grows older, into a solid form, and is brought to us in barrels. It is reputed an excellent balsam. Chambers.

A'MBERGRIS. n. f. [from amber and gris, or grey; that is, grey

A fragrant drug, that melts almost like wax, commonly of a greyish or ash colour, used both as a perfume and a cordial. It is found on the sea coasts of several warm countries, and on the western coasts of Ireland. Some imagine it to be the excrement of a bird, which, being melted by the heat of the fun, and washed off the shore by the waves, is swallowed by whales, who return it back in the condition we find it. Others conclude it to be the excrement of a cetaceous fish, because someone and in the intestines of such animals. But we have no times found in the intestines of such animals. But we have no instance of any excrement capable of melting like wax; and if it were the excrement of a whale, it should rather be found where these animals abound, as about Greenland. Others ble it for a kind of wax or gum, which diffils from trees, and drops into the sea, where it congeals. Many of the orientals imagine it fprings out of the sea, as naphtha does out of some sountains. Others suppose it a sea mushroom, torn up from the bottom by the violence of tempests. Others affert it to be a vegetable production, issuing out of the root of a tree, whose roots al-ways shoot toward the sea, and discharge themselves into it. Others maintain, that ambergris is made from the honey-combs, which fall into the sea from the rocks, where the bees had formed their nests; several persons having seen pieces that were half ambergris, and half plain honey-comb; and others have found large pieces of ambergris, in which, when broke, honey-comb, and honey too, were found in the middle. Some affirm it to be a true animal concrete, formed in balls in the body of the male spermaceti whale, and lodged in a large oval bag over the testicles. But, besides that it is not one spermaceti whale in a hundred, that is found to have ambergris, Neumann, chemist to the king of Prussia, absolutely denies it to be an animal fubstance, as not yielding in the analysis, any one animal principle. It may indeed be found in whales, but it must have been fwallowed by them. He concludes it to be a bitumen iffuing out of the earth into the fea; at first of a viscous consistence, but hardening, by its inixture with fome liquid naphtha, into

A precious stone of a violet colour, bordering on purple. The oriental amethyst is the hardest, scarcest, and most valuable; it is generally of a dove colour, though some are purple, and others white like the diamond. The german is of a violet colour, and the Spanish are of three forts; the best are the blackest or deepest violet; others are almost quite white, and some sew tinctured with yellow. They are found in a hill named St. Sigminont, in Catalonia, by following the vein of reddish or black earth, or a vein in a rock so coloured, and are all hexangular, and pointed like crystal. Sometimes a great number is sound sticking together, like the Bristol diamonds; but the best are found loose in the chinks of the rock. Beautiful ones are are found loose in the chinks of the rock. Beautiful ones are also found in the Pyreneans, and in the mountains of Auvergne. The amethyst is not extremely hard, but easy to be engraved upon, and is next in value to the emerald. Savary. AMMONIAC. n. f. The name of a drug.
Gum Ammoniac is brought from the East Indies, and is supposed to ooze from an umbelliserous plant. Dioscorides says, it is the juice of a kind of serula growing in Barbary, and the plant is called a as lists. Pliny call the tree metopion, which, he says, grows near the temple of Jupiter Ammon, whence the gum takes its name. It ought to be in dry drops, white with in, yellowish without, easily sufficiently series for incomplete. This gum is said to have served the ancients for incomple in their says. gum is faid to have ferved the ancients for incense, in their fa-crifices. It enters several medicinal compositions, as an attenuant and detergent; and, outwardly applied, it is resolutive Savary. Trevous. and fuppurative.

SAL AMMONIAC is a volatile falt of two kinds, ancient and modern. The ancient fort, described by Pliny and Dioscorides, was a native falt, generated in those large inns or caravanferas, was a native falt, generated in those large inns or caravaneras, where the croud of pilgrims, coming from the temple of Jupiter Ammon, used to lodge; who, in those parts, travelling upon camels, and those creatures when in Cyrene, a province of Egypt, where that celebrated temple stood, urining in the stables, or, say some, in the parched sands, out of this urine, which is remarkably strong, arose a kind of salt, denominated sometimes from the temple, Ammoniae, and sometimes from the country, Cyreniae. Since the cessation of these pilgrimages, no more of this salt is produced there; and, from this deficient no more of this falt is produced there; and, from this deficiency, fome suspect there never was any such thing: but this suspicion is removed, by the large quantities of a falt, nearly of the same nature, thrown out by mount Atna. The characters of the anc ent fal ammonia: are, that it cools water, turns aqua fortis into aqua regia, and consequently dissolves gold.

The modern f. I ammeniae is entirely factitious, and made in Egypt; where feveral long necked glass bottle; being filled with foot, a little sea falt, and the urine of cattle, and having their mouth luted with a piece of wet cotton, are placed over an oven or furnace, contrived for the purpose, in a thick bed of ashes, nothing but the necks appearing, and kept there two days and a night, with a continual strong fire. The steam swells up the cotton, and forms a patte at the vent-hole, hindering the falts from evap rating; which, being confined, flick to the top of the bottle, and are, upon breaking it, taken out in those large cakes, which they fend to England. Only soot exhaled from dung, is the proper ingredient in this preparation; and the dung of camels affords the strongest and best.

Our chymiths imitate the Egyptian fal ammoniae, by adding one part of common falt to five of urine; with which some mix that quantity of soot, and putting the whole in a vessel, they raise from it, by sublimation, a white, friable, farinaceous substance, which they call fal ammoniae. There are various preparations of this salt used in pharmacy; as, sublimate of sal ammoniae, and society of salt used as sudorificks, diureticks, and good aperients; voiatile salt ammoniae, used against malianant towers as a sudorifick, and in pocket bottles: soit is malignant fevers, as a sudorinck, and in pocket bottles; spirit of fat ammoniae, of various kinds.

Chambeis.

AMM. NI'ACAL. adj. [from ammoniae.] Having the properties of ammoniac falt.

Human blood calcin'd, yields no fixed falt; nor is it a fal ammoniack; for that remains immutable after repeated diffillations; and diffillation deliroys the ammoniaca! quality of animal falts, and turns them alkaline: fo that it is a falt neither quite fixed, nor quite volatile, nor quite acid, nor quite alkaline, nor quite ammoniaca'; but foft and benign, approaching nearest to the nature of fal ammoniac.

It is outwardly cloathed with the urinary membrane, and the chorion, which sometimes stick so close to one another, that they can scarce be separated.

It has also its vessels from the same origin as the chorion. Quincy.

AMO'MUM. n. s. [Lat.] A fort of fruit.

The commentators on Pliny and Dioscorides differ about the ancient amomum; but the generality of them suppose it to be a fruit different from ours. Scaliger is confident, that the amomum was no fruit; but the wood, which bore some resembles of pages and was used in orphalming of horizontal pages. blance to a bunch of grapes, and was used in embalming of bodies; whence the name munny was given to bodies embalmed with it. The modern amomum appears to be the fison, or sium, of the ancients, or bastard stone-parsley. It resembles the muscat grape, grows in clusters, and is about the thickness of a pea, round, membranous, and divided into three cells, that contain several brown angular grains, of a very strong aromatick taste and smell. This sruit is brought from the East Indies, and makes part of the composition of treacle. It is of a hot spicy taste and smell. To A'MPLIFY. v. a. [amplifier, Fr.]

To enlarge; to encrease any material substance, or object of fenfe.

So when a great moneyed man hath divided his chefts, and coins, and bags, he teemeth to himfelf richer than he was: and therefore a way to am lify any thing, is to break it, and to make anatomy of it in several parts, and to examine it according to the leveral circumstances. Bacon's Esays.

All concaves that proceed from more narrow to more broad, do amplify the found at the coming out.

2. To enlarge, or extend any thing incorporeal.

For as the reputation of the Roman prelates grew up in these blind ages, so grew up in them withal a desire of amplifying their power, that they might be as great in temporal forces as mens opinions have formed them in spiritual matters. Raleigh.

To exaggerate any thing; to enlarge it by the manner of representation.

Since I have plainly laid open the negligence and errours of every age that is past, I would not willingly seem to flatter the present, by am, lessing the diligence and true judgment of those servitours that have laboured in this vineyard.

Extent.
Whatever I look upon, within the amplitude of heaven and earth, is evidence of human ignorance. Glanville.

2. Largeness; greatness.

Men should learn how severe a thing the true inquisition of nature is, and accustom themselves, by the light of particulars, to enlarge their minds to the amplitude of the world, and not reduce the world to the narrowness of their minds. 3. Capacity.

With more than human gifts from heaven adorn'd,

Perfections absolute, graces divine,

And amplitude of mend to greatest deeds. Milton.

Splendour; grandeur; dignity.

In the great frame of kingdoms and commonwealths, it is in the power of princes, or estates, to add amplitude and greatness to their kingdoms.

5. Copiousness; abundance.

You should say every thing which has a proper and direct tendency to this end; always proportioning the amplitude of your matter, and the sulprise of your discourse, to your great the length of your time, to the convenience of your your matter, and the tuiness of your time, to the convenience of your delign; the length of your time, to the convenience of your Watts's Logick.

At return Of him so lately promis'd to thy aid, The woman's ced; obscurely then foretold, Now amplier kn wn, thy Saviour, and thy Lord.

Milton.

3. At large; copiously; with a diffusive detail.

Some parts of a peem require to be amply written, and with all the force and elegante of words; others must be cast into shadows; that is, patied over in filence, or but faintly touched.

Dryden's Dufresnoy. To A'MPUTATE. v. a. [amjuto, Lat.] To cut off a limb: a word used only in chirurgery.

Amongst the cruizers in private frigates from Dunkirk, it was complained, that their surgeons were too active in amputating those fractured members. Wiseman.

The operation of cutting off a limb, or other part of the body, with an infrument of fteel. The usual method of performing it, in the instance of a leg, is as follows. The proper part for the operation being four or five inches below the knee, the drive and flesh are first to be drawin way tight unwards. the skin and flesh are first to be drawn very tight upwards, and above this ligature another loofe one is passed, for the gripe; which being twisted by means of a stick, may be straitened to any degree at pleasure. Then the patient being conveniently structed, and the operator placed to the inside of the limb, which is to be held by one affisher, above and another below the fituated, and the operator placed to the infide of the limb, which is to be held by one affiftant above, and another below the part defigned for the operation, and the gripe sufficiently twisted, to prevent too large an hæmorrhage, the sless is, with a stroke or two, to be separated from the bone with the dismembering knife. Then the periosteum being also divided from the bone with the back of the knife, saw the bone asunder, with as sew strokes as possible. When two parallel bones are concerned, the sless that grows between them must likewise be separated before the use of the saw. This being done, the gripe may be slackened; to give an opportunity of tearching for the large blood vessels, and securing the hæmorrhage at their mouths. After making proper applications to t e stump, loosen the first After making proper applications to t'e flump, loosen the first ligature, and pull both the skin and the slesh as far as conveniently may be, over the stump, to cover it; and secure them with the cross stitch made at the depth of half or three quarters of an inch in the skin. Ancho'vy. n. f. [from ancheva, Span. or anchine, Ital. of the fame fignification.] A little fea fish, much used by way of fauce, or seasoning. Scaliger describes the anchovy as of the herring kind, about the length of a finger, having a pointed shout, a wide mouth, no teeth, but gums as rough as a saw. Others make it a fort of sardine, or pilchard; but others, with hetter reason, holding a peculiar species, very different from air better reason, hold it a peculiar species, very different from either. It is caught in the months of May, June, and July, on the coasts of Catalonia, Provence, &c. when it constantly repairs up the Straits of Gibraltar into the Mediterranean. The fishing is chiefly in the night time; when a light being put on the stern of their little fishing vessels, the anchovies slock round, and are caught in nets. When the fishery is over, they cut off the heads, take out the galls and guts, then lay them in barries.

A'NCIENT. adj. [ancien, Fr. antiquus, Lat.]

1. Old; that happened long fince; of old time; not modern.

Ancient and old are distinguished; old relates to the duration of the thing itself, as, an old coat, a coat much worn; and ancient, to time in general, as, an ancient dress, a habit used in former times. But this is not always observed; for we mention old cuffems; but though old be formetimes opposed to mo-dern, an ient is seldom opposed to new.

Ancient tenure is that whereby all the manours belonging to the crown, in St. Edward's or William the Conquerour's days, did hold. The number and names of which manours, as allothers belonging to common persons, he caused to be written in a book, after a furvey made of them, now remaining in the exchequer, and called Doomsday book; and such as y that book appeared to have belonged to the crown at that time, are calle ancient demesnes.

Architecture is divided into civil architecture, called by way of menne architecture, military architecture, called by way of eminence architecture, military architecture, or fortification; and naval architecture, which, besides building of ships and vessels; includes also ports, moles, docks, &c. Some think the Tyrians were the first improvers of architecture; but others contend that the rules of this art were delivered by God himself to Solomon, from whom the Tyrians had their instruction, which they afterwards communicated to the Egyptians; thefe to the Grecians, and these again to the Romans. Under Augustus architesture arrived to its greated glory; but afterwards dwindled by degrees, and at last fell with the watern empire, in the fifth century, when the Visigoths de troyed all the most beautiful monuments of antiquity; and a new manner of building took its rise called the Gothick, coarse, artless, and massive. Of the same kind was the Arabesk, Mo risk or Moorish architesture, brought from the South by the Moors' and Saracens. The architests of the thirteenth, for unsently, and offerenth centuries, who had some knowledge of findsture. and fifteenth centuries, who had some knowledge of sculpture, feemed to make perfection consist altogether in the delicary and multitude of ornaments, which they frequently be towed on their buildings without any conduct or talte. In the two last centuries, the architects of Italy and Fr. nee were wholly bent upon retrieving the primitive simplicity and beauty of ancient architecture, in which they did not fail of success. This art is divided into five orders; the Tufcan, Dorick, Ionick, Corinthian, and Composite; which took their rise from the different proportions that the different kinds of buildings rendered page from the dered page from the different kinds of buildings rendered page from the diff dered necessary, according to the bulk, strength, delicacy, richness, or simplicity required.

A'RSENICK. n. f. [ἀρσένικου.] A ponderous mineral substance, volatile and uninstammable, which gives a whiteness to metals in sussion, and proves a violent corrosive posson; of which there are three forts. Native or yellow arfenick, called also auripigmentum or orpiment, is chiefly found in copper mines, in a fort of glebes or stones of different suggestions. Its colour, though always yellow, yet admire of different suggestions. colour, though always yellow, yet admits of different shades and mixtures, as a golden yellow, a reddish yellow, or a green yellow. It contains a small portion of gold, but not worth the expense of separating it. White or crystalline arfenick is extracted from the native kind, by subliming it with a proportion of sea salt, and is chiefly used among us. It is said to be sound native in some German mines. The smallest quantity of crystalline arguments being mixed with any metal. faid to be found native in some German mines. The smallest quantity of crystalline arjenick, being mixed with any metal, absolutely destroys its malleability; and a single grain will turn a pound of copper into a beautiful seeming silver, but without dustility. There is a method practised in Hungary, of procuring yellow and white arjenick from cobalt. Red arjenick is a preparation of the white, made by adding to it a mineral sulphur. There are several chymical preparations of a senick, in ended to blunt its corrosive salts, and render it a ar jenick, in ended to blunt its corrofive falts, and render it a fafe medicine; but experience proves that it should never be fate medicine; but experience proves that it should never be used inwardly, in any form.

Arjenick is a very deadly posson; held to the fire, it emits sumes, but siquates very little.

As this mixture of blood and chyle panelli through the arterial tube, it is pressed by two contrary forces; that of the heart driving it forward against the sides of the tube, and the elastick force of the air, pressing it on the opposite sides of those air-bladders; along the surface of which this arterial tube creeps.

Arbithmet.

ARTERIO'TOMY. n. f. [from αρ]ηρία, and τέμνω, to cut.] The operation of letting blood from the artery: a practice much in use among the French.

A'RTERY. n. f. [arteria, Lat.] An artery is a conical canal, conveying the blood from the heart to all parts of the body. Each artery is composed of three coats; of which the first feems to be a thread of fine blood vessels and nerves, for nourishing the coats of the artery; the second is made up of circular, or rather spiral fibres, of which there are more or sewer strata, according to the bigness of the artery. These fibres have a strong elasticity, by which they contract themselves with some force, when the power by which they have been stretched out ceases. The third and inmost coat is a fine transparent membrane, which keeps the blood within its canal, that otherwise, upon the dilatation of an artery, would easily separate the spiral fibres from one another. As the arteries grow smaller, these coats grow thinner, and the coats of the veins feem only to be continuations of the capillary arteries.

The arteries are elastick tubes, endued with a contractile force, by which they drive the blood still forward; it being hindered from going backward by the valves of the heart. Arb.

Carew's Survey of Cornwal.

BAIL. n. s. [of this word the etymologists give many derivations; it seems to come from the French bailler, to put into the hand; to deliver up, as a man delivers himself up in surety.]

Bail is the freeing or setting at liberty one arrested or imprisoned upon action either civil or criminal, under security taken for his appearance. There is both common and special bail; common bail is in actions of small prejudice, of slight proof, ken for his appearance. There is both common and special bail; common bail is in actions of small prejudice, of slight proof, called common, because any sureties in that case are taken: whereas, upon causes of greater weight, or apparent speciality, special bail or surety must be taken. There is a difference between bail and mainprise; for he that is mainprised, is at large, until the day of his appearance: but where a man is bailed, he is always accounted by the law to be in their ward and custody until the day of his appearance: but where a man is bailed, he is always accounted by the law to be in their ward and custody for the time: and they may, if they will, keep him in ward or in prison at that time, or otherwise at their will.

[from βαρω, weight, and μέτρον, measure.] A machine for measuring the weight of the atmosphere, and the variations in it, in order chiefly to determine the changes of the weather. It differs from the baroscope, which only shews that the air is heavier at one time than another, without specifying the difference. The barometer is sounded upon the Torricellian experiment, so called from Torsicellian experiment. of it, at Florence, in 1643; which is a glass tube filled with mercury, horizontally sealed at one end; the other open and immerged in a bason of stagnant mercury; so that, as the weight of the atmosphere diminithes, the mercury in the tube will descend, and, as it encreases, the mercury will ascend; the column of mercury suspended in the tube, being always equal to the weight of the incumbent atmosphere. Many attempts have been made to render the changes in the baromiter more fenfible, in order to measure the atmosphere more accurately; and hence arose a great number of barometers, of different structures. Dr. Halley observes, in the Philosophical Transactions, that in calm weather, when the air is inclined to rain, the mercury is commonly low; in serene good settled weather, high. On great winds, though unaccompanied with rain, the mercury is lowest of all with record to the point of the compassion of the print of the pr of all, with regard to the point of the compass the wind blows on. The greatest heights of the mercury are on easterly and north-casterly winds, cateris paribus. After great storms of wind, when the mercury has been low, it rises again very fast. In calm frosty weather, it stands high. The more northerly In calm frosty weather, it stands high. The more northerly places find greater alterations than the more fouthern; and within the tropicks, and near them, there is little or no varia-tion of the height of the mercury. The rifing of the mercury forebodes fair weather after foul, and an easterly or north-easterly wind; its falling protends foutherly or westerly winds, or both. In a storm, the mercury begining to rise, is a pretty fure sign that it begins to abate. But there are frequently great changes in the air without any percentible alternation in the changes in the air, without any perceptible alteration in the barrometer. The alterations of the weight of the air, are generally allowed to be the cause of those in the barometer; but philosophers cannot easily determine whence those alterations rise in the atmosphere.

The measuring the heights of mountains, and finding the elevation of places above the level of the fea, hath been much promoted by barometrical experiments, founded upon that effential property of the air, its gravity or pressure. As the column of mercury in the baron eter is counterpoised by a column of air of equal weight, fo whatever causes make the air heavier or lighter, the p. csiure of it will be thereby encreased or lessen-ed, and of consequence the mercury will rise or fall. Again, the air is condensed or expanded, in proportion to the weight or force that presses it. Hence it is, that the higher from the sea, in the midland countries, the mercury descends the lower; because the air becomes more rarified and lighter, and it falls lowest upon the tops of the highest mountains. Gravity is another property of air, whereby it counterpoises a column of mercury from twenty-seven inches and one half to thirty and one half, the gravity of the atmosphere varying one tenth, which are its utmost limits; so that the exact specifick gravity of the air cannot be determined when the barometer stands at thirty inches, with a moderate heat of the weather.

BA'RON. n. f. [The etymology of this word is very uncertain. Bare, among the Romans, fignified a brave warriour, or a bru-tal man; and, from the first of these fignifications, Menage derives taron, as a term of military dignity. Others suppose it originally to fignify only a man; in which fense baron, or varr.n, is still used by the Spaniards; and, to confirm this conjecture, our law yet uses baron and femme, husband and wife.
Others deduce it from ber, an old Gaulish word, fignifying commander; others from the Hebrew 723, of the same import. Some think it a contraction of far homme, or peer, which feems least probable. ]

A degree of nobility next to a viscount. It may be probably thought, that anciently, in England, all those were called barons, that had such signiories as we now call court barons. And it is said, that, after the conquest, all such came to the parliament, and sat as nobles in the upper house. But when, by experience, it appeared, that the parliament was too much crouded with such multitudes, it became a custom, that no a should come, but such as the king, for their extraordinary wildom or quality, thought good to call by writ; which writ rail hac vice tantum. After that, men, seeing that this state of ne cality was but casual, and depending marrely on the prince's pleasure, obtained of the king letters patent of this digging them and their heirs male: and these were called barons by servers patent, or by creation, whose posserity are now those hallows that are or by creation; whose posterity are now those battons that are called lords of the parliament; of which kind the king may create more at his pleasure. It is nevertheless thought, that there are yet barons by writ, as well as barons by letters patent, and that they may be discerned by their titles; the barons by writ being those, that to the title of lord have their own furnames annexed; whereas the barons by letters patent, are named by their baronies. These barons which were first by writ, may now justly also be called barons by prescription; for that they have continued barons, in themselves and their ancestors, beyond the memory of man. There are also barons by tenure, as the bimemory of man. There are also barons by tenure, as the bi-fhops of the land, who, by virtue of baronies annexed to their bishopricks, have always had place in the upper house of par-liament, and are called lords spiritual.

BEAR. n. f. [bena, Saxon.]

1. A rough favage animal.

Every part of the body of these animals is covered with thick shaggy hair, of a dark brown colour, and their claws are hooked, which they use in climbing trees. They seed upon fruits, honey, bees, and slesh. Some have falsely reported, that bears bring their young into the world shapeless, and that their dams lick them into form. The dams go no longer than thirty days, and generally produce five young ones. In the winter, they lie hid and asleep, the male forty days, and the semale four months; and so soundly for the first source days, that blows will not wake them. In the sleepy season, they are said to have no nourishment but from licking their seet; for it is certain they eat nothing, and, at the end of it, the males are very have no nourishment but from licking their feet; for it is certain they eat nothing, and, at the end of it, the males are very fat. This animal has naturally an hideous look, but when enraged it is terrible; and, as rough and stupid as it seems to be, it is capable of discipline; it leaps, dances, and plays a thousand little tricks at the sound of a trumpet. The sless of bears was much esteemed by the ancients. BE ZOAR. n. /. [from pa, against, and zahar, poison, Persick.]

A medicinal stone, formerly in high esteem as an antidote, and brought from the East Indies, where it is said to be found in the dung of an animal of the goat kind, called pazan; the flone being formed in its belly, and growing to the fize of an acorn, and fometimes to that of a pigeon's egg. Were the real virtues of this flone answerable to its reputed ones, it were doubtless a panacea. Indeed its rarity, and the peculiar manner of its formation, which is now supposed to be fabu-lous, have perhaps contributed as much to its reputation as its intrinsick worth. At present, it begins to be discarded in the practice of medicine, as of no efficacy at all. There are also fome occidental bezoars brought from Peru, which are reckon-ed inferiour to the oriental. The name of this stone is also ed inferiour to the oriental. The name of this stone is also applied to several chymical compositions, designed for antidotes, or counter poisons; as mineral, solar, and jovial besours. Savary. Chambers.

BONE. n. f. [ban, Saxon.]

1. The folid parts of the body of an animal are made up of hard fibres, tied one to another by small transverse fibres, as those of the muscles. In a feetus they are porous, soft, and easily discerned. As their pores fill with a substance of their own nature, so they increase, harden, and grow close to one another. They are all spongy, and full of little cells, or are of a considerable firm thickness, with a large cavity, except the teeth; and where they are articulated, they are covered with a thin and strong membrane, called the periosteum. Each bone is much bigger at its extremity than in the middle, that the articulations might be firm, and the bones not easily put out of joint. But, because the middle of the bone should be strong, to suffain its allotted weight, and resist accidents. firong, to sustain its allotted weight, and resist accidents, the fibres are there more closely compacted together, supporting one another; and the bone is made hollow, and consequently not so easily broken, as it must have been had it been solid and fmaller.
